Neutrality Fight Centers On 90-Day Credit Plan

Minton Suggests Provision Might Be Abandoned to Guarantee Passage

By William V. Nessly
Post Staff Writer

A historic Senate debate on revision of the Nation's neutrality law, set to begin tomorrow, gave promise last night of opening on the disputed issue of whether 90-day credits for belligerent purchasers of American goods shall be permitted.

The question had supplanted for the time being, at least, the original issue of repeal of the arms embargo, an issue on which informal polls now indicate a two-to-one affirmative division in the Senate.

As the Foreign Relations Committee yesterday filed its lengthy report urging enactment of the measure it had drafted to carry out President Roosevelt's desire for ending of the embargo, open hostility to the 90-day credit provision in the bill was voiced by several Senators favoring the main objective of embargo repeal.

Strict Cash Wanted

The opposition brought from the majority whip, Senator Minton of Indiana, a suggestion that the credit clause be eliminated to permit sales to belligerent powers only on a strict "cash and carry" basis.

The new outbreak of contention, however, found Chairman Pittman, of the Foreign Relations group, and Senator Borah (Republican), of Idaho, outstanding opponent of the revision move, united in the view that the credit clause does not contravene the Johnson act barring loans or credits to nations that have defaulted on their war debts to this country.

Pittman had expressed the view on Friday that the committee's provision did tend to modify the Johnson act, and Senator Johnson (Republican), of California, author of the loan ban, promptly opened an attack on the proposed section.

Yesterday, Pittman said further study had led him to believe there would not necessarily be infringement on the existing law. Since only commercial credits would be involved, he held, transactions would be on a virtual cash basis. Borah, on the opposite side in the embargo fight, agreed 90-day credit is tantamount to cash.

In other circles it was pointed out that under Section 3 of the present neutrality law, President Roosevelt already has exempted from the loan and credit restrictions of that act "ordinary commercial credits and short-term obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peace-time commercial transactions."

Thomas Agrees in View

Senator Thomas (Democrat), of Utah, a member of Pittman's committee, agreed with the chairman that the Johnson act was intended to prevent war debt defaulters from floating new bond issues here, and that the commercial credit provision of the committee bill would not conflict with it.

Borah said he felt the 90-day credit soon would be found insufficient to satisfy those favoring trade with belligerents, and expressed fear there then would be a move for additional legislation which virtually would wipe out the Johnson law.

Minton, meanwhile, declared that elimination of the credit allowance would make it "much easier" to pass the bill. He pointed out that if the strict cash requirement did not prove satisfactory it could be altered at the January session of Congress, a suggestion that brought no expression of support from other Administration supporters.

Senator McCarran (Democrat), of Nevada, who has opposed the bill, predicted that "if this is made a strict cash-on-the-barrel-head pro-

Hit by Navy Center Sims (19), William and Mary's Simpson (8) fumbles. Navy recovered, scored, won, 31-6

LITTLE PACIFIC COLLEGE of the Coast staged the biggest upset of the young football season yesterday, beating mighty California, 6-0. Notre Dame's third-period field goal defeated Purdue, 3-0, before 40,000 South Bend fans. Pitt's "unsubsidized" Panthers uncorked a surprising passing attack to beat Washington, 27-6.

CHALLEDON FLASHED ACROSS the finish line five lengths ahead of his nearest rival to win the added $15,000 Havre de Grace Handicap. Owner William Woodward announced the permanent retirement of his Johnstown, which was adjudged the 3-year-old champion of his age until his recent crushing defeat in the Arlington Classic.

THE NATS OUTSLUGGED the Athletics, 9-5, as Rookie Joe Haynes recorded a pitching victory. The Pittsburgh Pirates announced the signing of Frankie Frisch as manager for a term of two years. He succeeds Pie Traynor who allegedly resigned. The latest New York City bookie odds favor the Yankees by 3-1 to defeat Cincinnati's Reds in the World Series opening Wednesday.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND unveiled a big, rugged eleven and a pair of crack backs in Pershing Mondorff and Joe Murphy as it ran roughshod over Hampden-Sydney to win its opener at College Park, 26-0. Mondorff, converted this season from a blocker to a running back, and Murphy, Southern Conference dash champion, had a hand in all four Terp touchdowns.

Armed Merchant Ships to Be Sunk WithoutWarning, Nazis Announce

By C. Brooks Peters
Copyright by New York Times

Berlin, Sept. 30.—A stern warning to Britain against the arming of commercial vessels to defend themselves against submarine attack was issued by Berlin today.

It was stated that it was necessary that Germany view such armed ships in a category similar to warships and thus subject them to torpedoing without taking the conventional provisions to assure the safety of the crew.

Germany, it is contended here, has been carrying on submarine warfare against the British merchant marine, in retaliation for the blockade announced by Britain against the Reich, in accordance with the provisions of the U-boat protocols of 1930 and 1936, which stipulate that measures to assure the safety of the crew of the ship to be sunk must be taken by the submarine commander.

No Other Choice, Nazis Say

Winston Churchill, British first lord of the admiralty, alleged in a declaration to Parliament that the British merchant marine was being armed in order to ward off submarine attacks. It is therefore held that submarine commanders cannot be expected to risk their ships and crews by endeavoring to provide for the safety of crews of ships that may open fire on them.

While this provision is in process of being taken, there is no other choice, it is claimed here, but to destroy the weapons of the enemy ship. If, under the circumstances, that is not feasible, there remains nothing to do but to sink the ship, regardless of the fate of the ship's crew, Nazis assert.

This "intensification" of the war on the British merchant marine, as the result of the British decision, is stated semiofficially to be "most extremely regretted in Berlin, where, however, no other choice remained to the Reich but to return like for like."

The British action, it is asserted, has no justification in international law, and neutrals are warned that they will travel at their own responsibility on armed merchant ships."

Held Change of Policy

London, Sept. 30 (AP).—The British admiralty said tonight the German radio had broadcast an announcement that Germany now would consider every vessel of the British merchant navy as a "warship."

The admiralty said it interpreted this as a possible indication of "an immediate change of policy in German submarine warfare."

An announcement by the British ministry of information said:

"The following message has been promulgated to all British merchant ships by the admiralty:

"'The following has been received by German broadcast this evening:

"'Several German submarines have been attacked by British merchant ships in the past few days.

"'Hitherto,' the German wireless asserts, 'German submarines have observed international laws by always warning merchant ships before attacking them. Now, however, Germany will have to retaliate by regarding every vessel of the British merchant as a warship.'

"'While the above of course is entirely untrue, it may indicate an immediate change of policy in Ger-

Turkish Envoy, Snubbed, Sees British, French At Moscow

By G. E. R. Gedye
Copyright by New York Times.

Moscow, Sept. 30.—A sensational development in connection with the visit of the Turkish foreign minister, Shukru Saracoglu, came this afternoon when he invited the British Ambassador to Moscow, Sir William Seeds, and the French Charge d'Affaires, Jean Payart, to call on him.

Despite silence in Turkish circles as to the situation regarding the Moscow visit of Turkey's ostentaciously neglected foreign minister, it was possible to elicit that up to 3 o'clock this afternoon, he had not yet had a single interview with Premier Molotoff since German Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop arrived.

Thus, Turkish contacts here were limited to a couple of meals, formal calls and brief conversations on the day of Von Ribbentrop's arrival. It was not hard to discuss today a feeling of suppressed indignation and resentment over treatment of the Turkish foreign minister after the Soviet Union had specifically invited him to come to Moscow.

Turk Leaving Immediately

It is, of course, possible that the invitation to British and French diplomatic representatives to meet him tonight was to inform them that Turkey was obliged to agree to whatever proposals were made to her, but all available evidence points in the opposite direction.

In authoritative Turkish circles it was admitted their foreign minister was definitely leaving Moscow tomorrow, possibly even tonight, although the latter is unlikely.

[At Ankara, however, authoritative circles told the Associated Press Turkey was ready to cancel her mutual assistance pacts with Britain and France if they go to war with Russia. This report led some observers to believe it might have been the topic of Saracoglu's talks with the British and French diplomats. A Turkish military mission, on the other hand, is en route to London, reportedly to conclude formally the alliance pacts.

[Meanwhile, Rumania's foreign minister, Grigore Gafencu, was reported by the Associated Press to have been summoned to Moscow, possibly making the trip Monday.

[Whether this was in connection with reports of a projected Balkan neutral bloc or presaged Soviet demands for concessions from Rumania, including return of Bessarabia, could not be learned. Bucharest reports, however, told of an unconfirmed rumor that Russia had given assurances she would not attack the Bessarabian frontier.—Editor's note.]

Real Accord Doubted

At Moscow, the whole course of events connected with the Turkish visit tended to contradict the theory that the Russo-German accord was perfect and that everything was cut and dried from the moment of signature to the original non-aggression pact and to confirm the theory favored by this correspondent that Von Ribbentrop was sent from Berlin as a consequence of Germany laying in a veto against Russian schemes in Central Europe and the Balkans.

The theory of any real Russo-German accord gets daily more difficult to maintain, high sounding

The War Today

HITLER SUMMONED Italian Foreign Minister Ciano to Berlin, and called the Reichstag into session as observers speculated on the possibility of new peace ultimatums to the Allies.

RUMANIA'S FOREIGN MINISTER was reported planning a visit to Moscow, where Turkey's foreign minister yesterday saw British and French diplomats; Russia's Balkan aims were expected to be clarified soon.

GERMANY WARNED Britain that armed merchant ships would be sunk without warning because of alleged "attacks" on German submarines.

BRITAIN AWAITED a Turkish military mission to put into final form their mutual assistance pact, amid reports Turkey might reserve the right to cancel the alliance should Britain go to war with Russia.

POPE PIUS expressed hope "enemies of God" would not be able to destroy religious freedom in Poland.

SLOVAK MUTINY against fighting for Germany in Poland was described by one of the mutineers.

BALTIC STATES feared further expansion of Soviet domination, as Rumania heard reports of Moscow demands for naval bases in Latvia.

POLAND'S GOVERNMENT resigned, and a new regime was set up in Paris, as former President Moscicki left Rumania for France. Page 8.

PREMIER DALADIER and French defense chiefs reviewed the first four weks of war as Paris reports told of advances along the Moselle and near Saarbruecken. Page 6.

BRITAIN ADMITTED loss of "several" planes over the Western Front, and Germany claimed eight enemy planes were downed. Page 4.

MAIN FIGHT on new neutrality bill centers on 90-day credit provision for belligerent purchasers of American goods, rather than over embargo repeal.

'Turks on Our Side' British Press Insists

Signing of Mutual Assistance Pact With England and France Reported to Await Return of Foreign Minister From Moscow

By Raymond Daniell
Copyright by New York Times.

London, Sept. 30.—With the Nazis apparently seeking to use diplomacy to end the war, the center of British interest in the international chess game turned today from Poland to the Baltic and the Balkans and to the Near East.

A vitally important decision by Turkey on her attitude in the war between the democratic allies and Germany is believed near at hand and it was the informed belief here that the decision will not be unfavorable to the French-British cause.

According to apparently authentic but unconfirmed reports here a mutual assistance treaty and commercial agreements which Great Britain and France have been negotiating with Turkey since early spring are about to be concluded and will be signed upon Turkish Foreign Minister Saracoglu's return to Ankara from Moscow. A Turkish military mission is expected in London next week.

A report that Saracoglu conferred with Sir William Seeds, British minister to Moscow, and Jean Payart, French charge d'affaires in Moscow, while waiting to interview Premier Molotoff, is seen here as encouraging. So, too, were assurance that Russo-Turkish conversations would be confined to problems in the Balkans and relations of the two countries chiefly concerned.

Hitler Believer Anxious for Peace

The importance of dickering for Turkish friendships is clearer when viewed in the light of possible strategy by Hitler, should his expected peace move meet the cold rebuff that is expected and his threat of joint Russian-German action materializes. In that event, it is regarded possible that Russia might attempt some diversion in the Near East or the Balkans where it would come as no surprise if the Soviets used Bessarabia as caviar before gulping Rumania.

It is the general belief here that Hitler is anxious for a quick peace. His implied threat that he and Stalin will become allies if the French and British fail to acquiesce with their division of Poland is viewed as evidence of this. His calling of the Reichstag for next week and his summons of Count Ciano to Berlin are believed preparatory to a formal offer of peace on what he believes to be tempting terms.

Believe Will Stick

Failing in his purpose military experts believe three courses are left to him. He could hurl his army against the French in a frontal attack along the present 120-mile front or even extend it by violating the neutrality of Belgium, the Netherlands or Switzerland. That would be risky business but not necessarily one from which he would shrink.

Or he could proceed to fight a defensive war behind the Siegfried positions while his air force tried to destroy British ports to relieve the blockade and terrorize civilians.

A third possibility also entails defensive warfare on the Western Front while he and Stalin embark on a joint agression in the Balkans with the aim of dividing the spoils between them.

The possibility is not overlooked of a Russian adventure in Iraq and Syria, threatening French and Brit-

Fuehrer to Give Reichstag Speech This Week; New Peace Bid Seen

By Louis P. Lochner
Associated Press Staff Writer

Berlin, Sept. 30.—Adolf Hitler, moving swiftly upon his conquest of Poland and expanded partnership with Soviet Russia, tonight arranged for consultation with an envoy of his Italian ally and a declaration before his Reichstag.

Foreign Minister Ciano of Italy was due early tomorrow night in Berlin in response to a German government invitation which Germans said was evidence of the loyalty with which the Fuehrer kept his Axis partner, Premier Mussolini, informed.

The Reichstag, called only to hear Hitler give an exposition of his policies, will meet "in the coming week" and informed sources said the Fuehrer would outline the future relations of Germany and Russia.

Treaty to Be Topic

The treaty concluded Thursday in Moscow by Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop will form the centerpiece of the Reichstag speech, these sources said they believed.

It was regarded as a matter of course that Hitler also would give an account of his stewardship as supreme commander of Germany's armed forces since September 1 when he addressed the body before racing to the Eastern Front behind his troops driving into Poland.

Authoritative circles were unanimous today in pointing out that in the past the western powers, except for Napoleon in 1807, never bothered about Poland's fate.

He'll Say Hands Off

It was indicated that from this it might be assumed that Hitler, too, will tell the western powers once more to keep their hands off eastern Europe's affairs.

Before the Reichstag meets—the actual date has yet to be announced—Hitler will have met Count Ciano, Mussolini's son-in-law and emissary.

The Italian foreign minister was invited to Berlin by the German government immediately after Von Ribbentrop returned yesterday from Moscow and reported to Hitler on his negotiations with Soviet Russian leaders.

Responsible persons assumed that Count Ciano would not only receive information when he arrives here, but he will be in a position to give Hitler an exposition of the chances for mediation by Italy in the European conflict.

Hitler Sees War Chiefs

Whether Hitler will make a new peace offer before the Reichstag will depend partly upon Count Ciano's report on Italian sentiment in that direction, these sources said.

Hitler conferred today in the chancellery with a number of generals and admirals.

Roosevelt Suggests Committee Be Alert To Bar Profiteering

By the Associated Press

President Roosevelt yesterday asked the Temporary National Economic Committee to keep "a constant eye" on increases in prices of basic materials to prevent profiteering.

In a letter to Committee Chairman O'Mahoney (Democrat), Wyoming, the President said he believed "constant surveillance is clearly in keeping with the purposes and objectives for which the TNEC was established, and I believe that, in carrying forward such a program, your committee can well become an important part in our first line of national defense against ugly and inhuman greed."

Mr. Roosevelt referred to a statement made by O'Mahoney in opening the present series of committee hearings last Monday. O'Mahoney said then that the committee's work would be emphasized by the prospect of profiteering resulting from the European war.

Poland Not Going to Die, Pope Asserts

Pius Hopes Religious Liberty Will Survive In Crushed Nation

By Edward Kennedy,
Associated Press Staff Writer

Castel Gandolfo, Sept. 30.—Pope Pius XII expressed the hope today that religious freedom would survive in dismembered Poland "despite many reasons for fear given by the too-well-known designs of enemies of God."

Speaking at an audience for Polish residents of Rome in his first public utterance since the invasion of Poland, the Pope admonished his hearers that "as you shed bitter tears for your dead, remember that Poland is not going to die."

"May Christ, who wept at the death of Lazarus and over the ruin of his fatherland, gather and some day compensate you for the tears you spill over your dead and over Poland which does not want to die."

Consoling the Polish people "in this frightful, tragic hour," he told the Poles that their sorrow "thus tempered with hope will not be mixed with rancor or even less with hate."

He offered his consolation, too, at the sight of "hundreds of thousands of poor human beings, some noncombatants" suffering from "wounds in bodies and souls from

Butler Ill, 8 Justices to Open Supreme Court Year Tomorrow

When the United States Supreme Court starts its 149th term tomorrow, Chief Justice Hughes will be on the bench as usual. There will be only one vacant chair, that of Associate Justice Butler, who is ill.

HUGHES

The Chief Justice returned Monday from a summer tour with his wife through New England, during which he convalesced fully from a duodenal ulcer which had forced him to be absent from court several weeks last spring. In the last three days he has been busy at the conference of judges of the ten judicial circuits in the Supreme Court Building. He told reporters "I am very well."

Justice Butler, confined to Garfield Hospital by a kidney ailment, spent a comfortable night last night, his doctor reported. There has been speculation that the 73-year-old justice might retire.

Tomorrow's court session will be a formality. The eight justices will admit attorneys to practice, hear motions and then recess for a week.

All eight were reported in excellent health and ready to take up the more than 400 appeals that have accumulated since the tribunal adjourned for the summer June 5.

Fewer major controversies are on that docket than at any time in recent years, since the court has passed on most of the New Deal legislation. However, a test case on the wage-hour law's constitutionality is expected to be passed on some time this session, and there are several antitrust actions filed by the Government against the American Medical Association, 12 Middle Western oil companies and

Cherry Trees Bloom Because They Are Sick

Japanese cherry trees were blooming on Hains Point yesterday, not as a result of warm weather, but because they are sick.

Frank T. Gartside, acting superintendent of National Capital Parks and an authority on their flora and fauna, said there is no connection between the unseasonable warmth of the last few days and the blooms, except the perversity of each.

The buds, he explained, are set for spring at this time of the year. A few blossoms have been forced on several trees near the end of the point in an effort to overcome their distress.

Message to 'Kuhn' Puts Bomb Guards At Grand Central

New York, Sept. 30 (AP).—The "bombing" of Grand Central Station tonight was a complete dud, the "zero hour" of 6 p. m. passing without any untoward incident.

A hundred detectives took up guard at the station shortly before 6 p. m. after a Queens resident reported he received a mysterious telephone message that a bombing was scheduled for that hour.

Raymond F. Clair, of Jamaica, said the caller first asked to speak to "Mr. Kuhn." When told "Mr. Kuhn" did not live there, the caller gave Clair the message, prefacing it with "Tell Mr. Kuhn."

Slovak Tells How Regiment Refused to March on Poles

By Daniel De Luce
Associated Press Staff Writer

Zilina, Slovakia, Sept. 30.—A story of a Slovak regiment which refused to march against Poland, defying a German threat of summary execution, was told today by one of the former mutineers.

The informant, who risked arrest if his identity became known to the police, produced evidence that he was mobilized before September 1 (when German troops entered Poland) and was garrisoned until 15 days ago at Kremnica, in middle Slovakia.

He said only the personal intervention of Gen. Ferdinand Csatlos, war minister and army commander, saved the regiment from German punishment. Csatlos hurried from the Polish front, reaching Kremnica before the 24-hour German ultimatum to "march or be shot" expired.

"Men of our regiment were all Slovaks, no Germans or Hungarians, and just a year ago we had been mobilized to fight for the Czecho-Slovak republic against Germany," the informant said. "We couldn't forget that, nor the old Slovak feeling of friendship for Slavic brothers in Poland.

"We got our marching orders but we dodn't march. We lined up with full equipment on the drill ground, nearly 3,000 strong. Most of us had been talking since the war's start two weeks before and we were solidly against a war we didn't want.

"We began singing the Czecho-Slovak national anthem. You could hear us a kilometer away. I tell you we were determined to be free men. Our officers let us go

Diplomats of the foreign power had been using the unlicensed set illegally to communicate with their home capital.

Because of the delicacy of the international situation, the seizure was kept secret. The Federal Communications Commission declines to reveal which embassy harbored the apparatus. Embassy officials used the set "surreptitiously;" they knew it was illegal, because licenses are not issued to foreigners.

But the commission regards this violation as foolhardy, because it is impossible for such an outlaw set to operate with any regularity without detection by monitor cars which can drive through the streets and spot wireless messages emanating from an address not authorized to harbor a sending set.

Patriots who have succumbed to the war scare could relax if they stopped to think that, to put it most cynically, no war is possible for us before election day in November, 1940, which is 13 months away.

As things look now, if the war continues, the rival campaigners will be flaunting rival banners: "He kept us out of war" versus "He'll keep us out of war."

7 CIO Directors Communists, Dies Quiz Told

Ex-Party Chief Says Soviets Held Family To Seal His Lips

By International News Service

Seven of the 40 directors of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, including Harry Bridges, were described as Communists, and 11 of the 44 C. I. O. national unions were declared controlled by Communists by Joseph Zack, resigned official of the Communist party, who testified before the Dies committee yesterday.

The former party official, once a delegate to the Comintern in Moscow and now a New York garment worker, told a story of persecution at the hands of Russian Communists which, he said, prompted him to break a long silence, and "talk" about the party.

Zack's wife and son, he asserted, have been held by the Soviets for nine years as "hostages," to force his good behavior in the United States. Efforts of Earl Browder, the party's general secretary in this country, and of the State Department, to obtain their release have been unavailing, he said.

Fear Sealed His Lips

Fear, he added, had sealed his lips, "but nothing much worse can happen to my wife and boy than already happened. Since the second year after our marriage, and since my son was one year old, they have been held in Russia. I can do nothing."

Zack explained that he left his family in Russia, following his attendance at the Comintern in 1927, when he was sent to South America by the Comintern in 1929.

The sole witness of the day, Zack agreed with Chairman Dies of the committee that a purge of Communists from both government and labor ranks was in order. But he expressed belief the elimination of party members from labor's rolls would be difficult.

"If John L. Lewis tried to get rid of the Communists," Zack said, "he might not find it so easy, because they control 11 of his national organizations."

Says They Hold Key Positions

The witness then revealed what he termed "the party strategy," which he said aimed at control of the maritime, radio, cable and telephone industries—main channels of communication power over which would be of great value, he said, in a social unheaval or time of war.

Declaring the Communist Party "holds a pivotal position" in the C. I. O. Zack then furnished a list of its directors whom he said he "knew or had reason to believe" are Communists. They were: Donald Henderson, Mervyn Rathborne, Ben Gold, Harry Bridges, Lewis Merrill, Michael Quill, and Joseph Curran.

He identified other C. I. O. leaders also as Communists, naming Wyndham Mortimer, Micheal Obermeir, Lewis Weinstock, Marcel Scherer, Irving Potash, George Addes, William Albertson and Sam Kramberg.

Through key positions, he said, the party controls the following C. I. O. affiliates: Furriers' Union, Independent Transport Workers, National Maritime Union, United Automobile Radio Workers Union, United Professional and Office workers of America, United Cannery, Agriculture Packing and Allied Workers of America, Furniture Workers, Industrial Union, Communications Association of America and the Federation of Architects, Engineers, Chemists, and Technicians.

The American Newspaper Guild, Zack added, is "partially controlled by the Communist Party," and its president, Heywood Broun, he claimed, was a party member from 1928 to 1930, but is now "at odds" with them, over the signing of the Russo-German non-aggression pact.

Nazis Wage Propaganda War In Americas Against U. S.

Papers With German News Services Give Impression We Are Fighting Alongside Britain; France Is Pictured as an Innocent Dupe

Buenos Aires, Stp. 30.—Germany is fighting a propaganda war with South America as the battlefield—and fighting it just as efficiently and ruthlessly as the military campaign that has been fought on the battlefields of Poland.

Germany's two bitter enemies in this propaganda war are England and the United States. A man from Mars dropping into South America and getting his first picture of the situation fom newspapers carrying German news would get the impression that Germany is already at war with the United States and that the United States is a more bitter enemy than England.

Although Germany has been at war with England only a month, its propaganda service has been at war with the United States more than a year, having openly declared hostilities in the South American field from the opening of the Pan-American Conference at Lima.

France is pictured as a rather innocent dupe who has been misled by Britain but with whom Germany still has hopes of maintaining a close friendship. Civilization, peace and prosperity are pictured as being undermined by the two arch enemies of man—England in Europe and the United States in Latin America.

Germany, according to the propaganda, is going to take care of the situation in Europe and is calling upon Latin Americans to rally against the underhanded machinations of the United States, intimating that they can always rely upon Germany to help them protect their civilization just as it is saving civilization in Europe today.

German propaganda has long been supplying newspapers of South America—especially papers in interior cities and towns—with a free news service received by wireless from Europe and distributed by telegraph from South American capitals.

Since the outbreak of hostilities this service, as well as a German-directed editorial service, has been printed in Bueno Aires by the German-language paper Deutsche La Plata Zeitung, by the Italian-language paper Giornale d'Italia and by the Spanish-language paper Diario Español, which has been supported by Franco sympathizers.

Both German and Italian papers are now printing their telegraphic news in Spanish language and all three are publishing editorials which are obviously inspired by an identical source. It is notable that Italian and Spanish papers—both strongly pro-German—no longer refer to the Russians as barbarians, as they did daily before the German-Russian pact was announced.

Billion-a-Year Defense Cost Seen for U. S.

Balancing of Budget Appears Remote, In View of Europe's War

Annual national defense costs were somewhere above the billion-dollar mark yesterday with no prospect of relief until peace returns to Europe.

From a budgeted $494,000,000 for national defense in the fiscal year 1934, President Roosevelt gradually raised the ante to $1,126,000,000 for the current fiscal year. But since submitting that estimate to Congress last January, international developments became so menacing that the sum was greatly exceeded.

The Congress which adjourned last month appropriated $1,645,000,000 for strictly national defense purposes in this fiscal year divided almost exactly between the Army and Navy. An additional $500,000,000 was in projects fitting into defense.

Notable in the naval appropriation were funds to continue work on 121 vessels and to lay keels of 23 more, includnig two 45,000-ton battleships. Funds were obtained to increase Army Air Corps strength to 5,500 planes by July 1, 1941.

Likely to Stay High

National defense appropriations for this fiscal years are 65 per cent greater than for the fiscal year which ended last June 30. It may not be necessary to maintain that pace of increase, but the chance of pulling defense costs below $1,000,000,000 annually is too small for consideration.

That fact puts it up to budget-makers to seek other means of economy if there are to be expenditure reductions. The big expenditure items as budgeted last January by Mr. Roosevelt are: National defense; interest on the public debt, $1,050,000,000; social security, $928,000,000; public works $1,044,000,000; and unemployment relief $2,019,000,000.

Public debt charges are impervious to economy. The national debt, $40,857,00,000 now compared with $38,394,000,000 a year ago, must be serviced in full and on schedule. Neither is social security susceptible to major cuts. That leaves public works and unemployment relief on which Mr. Roosevelt and Congress never have been able to agree when, how or where to cut.

Treasury Receipts Down

Circumstances rather than determined economy by the President or by Congress may contrive to improve the Nation's budget situation considerably during the next 12 months, even to the extent of making material reduction in relief costs.

The first quarter of the current fiscal year will end this week. Here are the Treasury's figures for the first quarter so far compared with the same period a year ago:

Expenses, $2,330,000,000 and $2,129,000,000; receipts, $1,408,000,000 and $1,475,000,000; net deficit, $912,000,000 and $853,000,000; working balance, $1,453,000,000 and $2,450,000,000.

The thumbnail report is that expenses and the deficit are up, receipts and the working balance are down.

Group Favors Surgeon at Glenn Dale

Resident, With Salary Of $5,600, Approved By Ruhland Advisors

Health Officer George C. Ruhland's advisory committee on tuberculosis has approved a proposal to appoint a resident surgeon at the Glenn Dale Santoria as an alternative to sending major surgical cases to Gallinger Hospital, it was revealed yesterday.

It is understood Dr. Ruhland would like to place the job in the same category as the resident physician at Gallinger Hospital. The latter pays $5,600. At the present time the Health Department's budget has $3,800 available for a physician at the sanatoria. The District Tuberculosis Association has been approached to provide $1,800 for this year's salary. It is expected the assoication will approve the amount at the next meeting.

Dr. Ruhland said he had interviewed as a candidate for the job, a physician who is a graduate of the University of Rochester and has had considerable experience in major surgery among tuberculosis patients.

An order recently by Dr. Ruhland to transfer major surgical cases from the Maryland institution to Gallinger Hospital raised protests from patients and several civic groups. He explained the patient would not be removed when any danger was involved, and the patient would receive "follow-up" treatment at Gallinger, where resident surgeons are always available.

Curley Orders Bingo Games Be Stopped

Archbishop Advises Parishes Failure Will Result in Prosecution

Archbishop Michael J. Curley, of Baltimore, has ordered pastors to stop "at once" bingo games sponsored in Catholic parishes in Washington, it was learned yesterday.

An official notice in this week's issue of The Catholic Review ordered that bingo games "must be eliminated from church entertainment of any and all kinds."

"Violation of this order," the notice continued, "will bring immediate prosecution from the civil authorities of the District of Columbia."

A member of the District Attorney's staff told The Post last night that bingo games had continued in at least three Catholic churches and in one Episcopal church despite an edict banning them about six months ago.

Several weeks ago, he said, police raided a commercial game in northeast Washington where patrons paid $1 each for the privilege of playing for prizes.

A few days after the raid, Assistant District Attorney John J. Wilson conferred with Police Chief Maj. EErnest W. Brown and requested him to "reiterate" instructions to precinct commanders against bingo. Brown, it was learned, conferred with Archbishop Curley shortly before publication of the order.

Law Being Evaded

Bingo game sponsors, the District Attorney's office revealed, had been using several devices to "get around the letter of the law." One of these was to permit patrons to play without paying a fee as long as they remained standing. If they wanted to sit down, they had to pay for their chairs.

In another case, winers were presented with slips permitting them to escape "dues" payments. At one of the larger commercial games, it was said, "dues" collections amounted to as much as $200 a game. Game expenses in the form of prizes, it was estimated, totaled no more than $30.

The District law, it was pointed out, makes no distinction between commercial games, played with profit to the operator, and games played to raise funds for charity. The Maryland law permits bingo for religious institutions.

Teamsters' Chief Says D. C. Strikers Won't Back Down

Dan Tobin, prseident of the International Teamsters Union, snorted defiance of the rival engineers' union last night and averred his men would not back down in the jurisdictional dispute which has crippled the building industry here.

Reached by telephone in Cincinnati, where he is attending the American Federation of Labor convention, Tobin said truck drivers affiliated with the teamsters' organization had a clear right to the hauling of premixed concrete, despite the engineers' conflicting claims.

He denied reports that he and John Possehl, president of the international operating engineers union, had got together in an attempt to settle the dispute.

The jurisdictional dispute, which came into the open September 12 when the teamsters struck, has affected District paving and sewer work, as well as private and public building construction throughout the city.

Couple Wed in Another World Go to Midwest on Honeymoon

Deceased Father of Bridegroom Chides Him for Fumbling With Ring in Spiritualist Rite; Departed Vocalists Furnish Solos

A couple of Washington overnment workers were honeymooning in the Midwest yesterday, following a wedding ceremony here pedformed by a clergyman dead two years. Vocal solos were by a man who departed this life in 1896 and a "Mrs. rable," also deceased.

That is the story of C. W. Anner, in whose home Mark L. Chase and Mrs. Edyth C. Tomlin were married Friday evening by remote control after a more conventional ceremony in Fairfax, Va., earlier in the day; and he doesn't care whether you believe it or not.

Observing that his remarks were falling upon sympathetic if not altogether credulous ears, Anner yesterday described the strange marriage rites, in which the parson's voice purportedly came out of a trumpet floating in the air.

30 Witnesses Present

"Mr. and Mrs. Chase are members of our spiritualist group," asserted Anner, who said he is a son of the late Rev. Dr. Anner, who officiated. "About 30 of us witnessed the demonstration."

It took about 45 minutes for the knot to be tied and one Jack Lilly and Mrs. Grable to sing their numbers, Anner said. The former sang "I Love You Truly" and the woman gave her version of "O Sole Mio," according to the host.

Anner was asked how the singer's voices were identified, especially that of the late Mr. Lilly, who passed away 43 year ago.

"He gave his name," was the reply, "and Mrs. Grable's voice was recognized by two of the persons present."

Pastor Converted After Death

The strangest part of the phenomenon is that, in life, Dr. Anner was an orthodox Methodist minister who was strongly critical of spiritualistic claims, according to C. W. Anner. Nor was Mr. Lilly a spiritualist, he added, though he sometimes sang at seances when he was of this earth.

A medium was in charge, of course, but instead of the voices being heard through his lips they emerged from a trumpet that floated about the room, Anner said. The medium furnished the ectoplasm and the trumpet floated by telekinesis.

"My father's voice sounded lower than it did in life but the inflections were exactly the same," Anner said. His home is at 2803 Ontario road.

Chides The Bridegroom

In life Dr. Anner was a linguist, his son said, but he chose to perform the wedding ceremony in English. At one point in the service he chided the bridegroom for fumbling with the ring, according to Anner.

"Thi is not the first time my father has come to us," he said. "We have heard him several times before, delivering lectures and giving instructions."

He declined to pose for a picture or to allow the trumpet to be photographed.

Chase, 48 is a general accounting office auditor. His bride, 42, is a senior clerk in the general land office.

Borah Rejects Efforts of Friends For '40 Nomination

Senator Borah (Republican), of Idaho, today disclosed that he had rejected overtures of friends in Wisconsin, Illinois, Georgia and South Carolina to organize a "Borah-for-President" movement.

The veteran Senator, a leader of opposition to the President's efforts to repeal the arms embargo clause of the neutrality law, said he replied "no" to letters of political leaders.

He made public one of the letters, written to Bernhard Gettelman of Milwaukee, in July, as typical of his answers.

"I do not feel I ought to encourage you and other friends in making any move in my behalf relative to the Presidency," Borah wrote.

He wrote in another letter: "Even if there were no other question involved, I'm sure that my age would prevent me from being considered." Borah is 74 years old.

In another letter, the Senator said he had asserted that the "present organization of the Republican Party precludes my being a candidate." He has long been at odds with some Republican leaders.

Clergy to Plead For Support Of Roll Call

Religious Leaders to Speak at Water Gate Services This Afternoon

Washington religious leaders will join in an appeal for support of the Red Cross Roll Call in ceremonies at the Water Gate at 4 p. m. today.

Three A Capella choirs, the District National Guard Band and American Legion posts will participate. Addresses will be delivered by Bishop James E. Freeman of the Protestant Episcopal diocese; Mgr. Lawrence J. Shehan, of St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church and head of the Catholic Charities; Rabbi Norman Gerstenfeld, of the Washington Hebrew Congregation, and the Rev. Edward H. Pruden, pastor of the First Baptist Church.

Curley Sends Message

From pulpits this morning pastors of all faiths will urge Washingtonians to join the Roll Call. Archbishop Michael J. Curley sent a message to be read in all Catholic churches today. He said:

"Each year the American Red Cross takes on added significance as a Nation-wide agency of mercy. It represents the American people's will to meet promptly and efficiently any public disaster that may occur. Its program has been developed in line with sound Christian traditions. In war and in peace it stands ready to minister to the needs of suffering humanity without any invidious distinction."

Rabbi Gerstenfeld, in a message to his congregation, will declare: "There never was a time when the need of philanthropic appreciation was as great as it is today." The Rev. William L. Darby, executive secretary of Washington Federation of Churches, said that "it is the duty and privilege of members of all churches to stand by the cause loyally and give to it generously."

Special Buses to Run

Choirs joining in the Water Gate meeting will have more than 150 voices and include singing units from First Congregational Church, Washington Missionary College, and Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints, under the direction of Mrs. Ruby Smith Stahl, George W. Greer, and D. Sterling Wheelright, respectively. The choral program has been arranged by Arthur W. Howes, choirmaster of St. John's Episcopal Church, and band selections by Meyer Goldman, National Guard band director.

Special buses will run from Seventeenth and K streets northwest to the Water Gate beginning at 3 p. m. The services will be broadcast by WMAL from 4:30 to 5 p. m.

The third day of the Roll Call ended yesterday, with 4,818 members enrolled, an increase of 1,167 over last year. Firms and offices reporting 100 per cent enrollment of employes included Tennessee Valley Authority and Coca Cola Bottling Co.

President Praises Church Movement For 'Loyalty Days'

Observance of "Loyalty Days," which began yesterday and continues today in churches throughout the country, has been indorsed by President Roosevelt in a letter to Dr. E. Graham Wilson, chairman of the executive committee of Religion and Welfare Recovery.

"There never has been a time in our history," wrote the Chief Executive, "when there was a deeper need for calling our people to face reality in religion than the present moment. Within our own Nation we are pressed by problems both national and international which call for divine guidance and power."

He said he was glad to learn the call was going forth "to bring the minds and hearts of men back to consciousness of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man and the sanctions of religion in services of worship and rededication."

Broadcasters to Meet On Enforcing of Code

The Committee of Audience Relations of the National Association of Broadcasters will meet in Washington tomorrow to discuss enforcement of the association's new code, which becomes effective today. The committee comprises representatives of eight radio stations and the three national broadcasting systems.

The boy is the son of Prince David Mdivani, from whom Miss Murray is divorced

'Cold Front' Due In D. C. Tomorrow

Rain began falling shortly before 7 o'clock last night, bringing what Weather Bureau forecasters said was the outrider of a "cold front" expected to strike here tomorrow.

Yesterday, the Weather Bureau said, was unusually hot and humid for this time of the year. Peak temperature was 85 degrees at 2:15 p. m., with humidity averaging 60 and 65 per cent.

For today, the forecast was "cloudy and much cooler with showers this morning."

District Seeks PWA Balances As Storm Fund

Use of Unexpended Amounts Suggested To Meet Project Cost

District commissioners this week will seek approval of the Public Works Administration to use unexpended funds for construction of the second section of the Piney Branch sewer to relieve flood conditions at Arkansas avenue and Delafield place northwest.

Plans for the second section have been completed and the District is ready to advertise for bids as soon as the PWA approves the project. Bids were opened yesterday for the first section of the sewer, which runs from just west of Sixteenth street to Arkansas avenue and Piney Branch parkway just south of Taylor street. The second section of the sewer will run from this point along Arkansas avenue just east of Iowa avenue northwest.

The entire project, including the second section, is estimated to cost $410,000. The low bid on the first section was $138,250. Although some money was left over from other sewer projects, the amount needed for the new project exceeds this balance and the commissioners have asked that other funds be permited to defray the expense of the second section.

The commissioners recently have been criticized by residents near the flood area for their failure to include the entire sewer project in the original public works program, which totalled $18,150,000 this year. However, the commissioners stated that they have always ben seympathetic to community needs and have been rushing plans for the new sewer and saving money on other bids so this work could be completed, P. W. A. permitting.

About 100 residents of the frequently flooded area organized the Arkansas Avenue Community Association Friday night and appointed a committee to inquire into the possibility of bringing suit against the District for damages. Officers said the association was organized largely to promote an adequate storm sewer.

Nazis Claim Seven British Planes Downed

London Concedes 'Some Casualties' in Aerial Battle Over Germany

By the United Press.

London, Sept. 30.—British warplanes suffered "some casualties" in an air battle at a great height over Germany today, the ministry of information announced. The Royal Air Force planes were reconnoitering over the Western Front when they encountered Nazi fighting craft.

(The German high command announced tonight that Nazi pursuit planes had shot down one French and seven British aircraft during the day, all but two over the Western Front. Two of the British planes were downed over the North Sea, the Germans said.)

The British radio said, however, that German reports of British aerial losses were unconfirmed. The broadcast added that practically all air fights in the war to date had taken place over German soil and that the enemy had suffered substantial losses.

Nazi Losses Not Given

The British information ministry, which said the Royal Air Force again had carried out successful reconnaissance flights over Germany by day and by night, added that enemy casualties in today's battles were not known.

Earlier the air ministry reported that R. A. F. pilots had flown for miles along Germany's Westwall fortifications at an altitude of only 600 feet, taking protographs.

The pictures detailed clearly some of the most heavily fortified zones of the Siegfried Line, the air ministry said. The British pilots took closeups of gun emplacements, tank traps, different types of camouflage and located for the artillery the Germans' network of communication lines.

It was considered noteworthy that none of the British aircraft on one reconnaissance flight was attacked either by gunfire or by German planes and the air ministry expressed the belief that German gunners at that time had mistaken the R. A. F. craft for German planes because they flew so low.

Soldiers Wave to Pilot

One British flier reported that he saw German soldiers busily camouflaging a newly mounted antiaircraft battery. Hearing an airplane engine overhead, they stopped work, looked up and waved greetings.

On a previous reconnaissance, the air ministry said, British planes flew over the German lines at an altitude of 21,000 feet in heavy clouds but were spotted by German gunners, who placed several shellbursts "uncomfortably near" the scouting craft.

Despite the shelling, the ministry said, the fliers obtained pictures of a huge expanse of country behind Germany's Siegfried Line. From both flights, it was said, headquarters was able to build up a comprehensive picture of German defenses.

(An earlier German communique had announced that five British warplanes were shot down yesterday in an attempted raid on the German North Sea Coast. Two British squadrons of six planes each were driven off before they could do any damage, the communique said.)

French Claim 14 Planes

Germany has lost 14 planes on the Western Front, the French claim, adding that Allied losses had been less than half that number in the Rhineland.

(German fighting craft and antiaircraft guns in the first month of the war, the Berlin announcement said, have shot down 37 French and 27 British planes.)

Al Smith to Speak Tomorrow

New York, Sept. 29 (AP).—Speaking in behalf of changes in the neutrality act, Alfred E. Smith is scheduled for a WABC-C. B. S. broadcast at 7 p. m. Sunday.

Other neutrality broadcasts—WOR-M. B. S., 8, American Forum, Senators Pittman, of Nevada; Nye, of North Dakota; Connally, of Texas; Clark, of Missouri; Van Nuys, of Indiana; Donahey, of Ohio, and Donaher, of Connecticut.

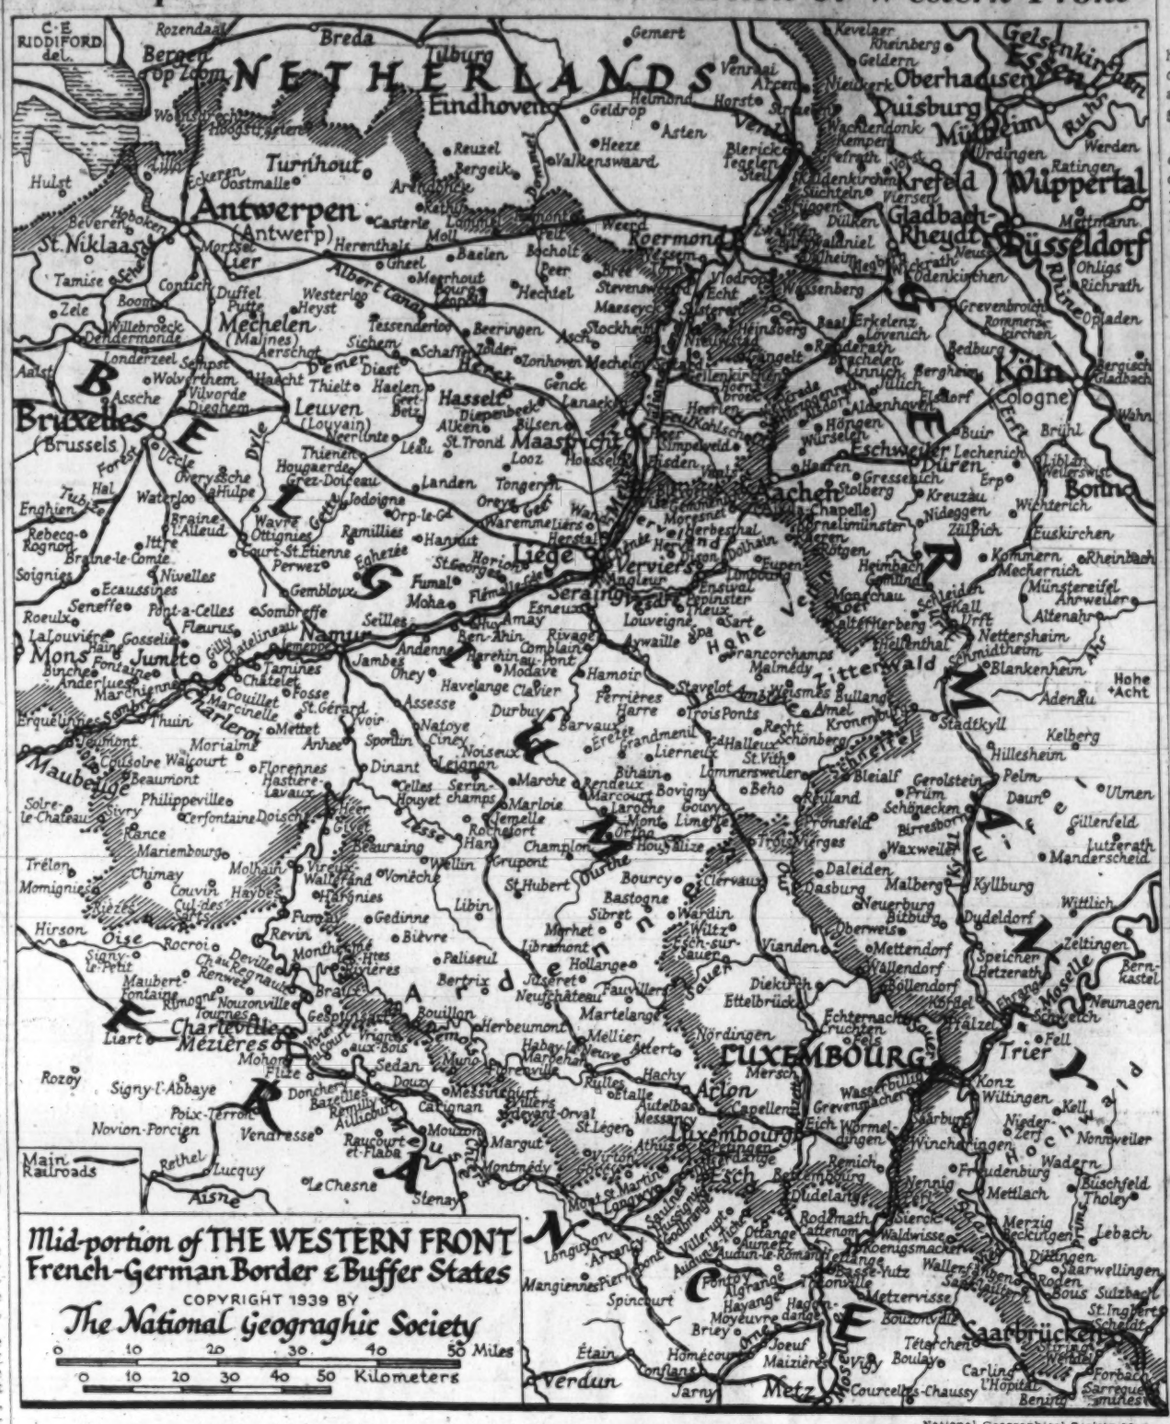
In addition, WJZ-N. B. C. and WABC-C. B. S. at 3:14 are to relay from London the talk by Winston Churchill, first lord of the British admiralty, on "First Month of the War."

Two Napoleons Met Defeat in Mid-Portion of Western Front



National Geographical Society Map.

If all the people in the world moved into the United States, and were equally spaced over its territory, it still would not be as densely populated as certain areas of the five countries shown in part on the above map. More civilian population per square mile is exposed to the hazards of war in these areas than along any other international borders of the world. In this region more international boundaries occur, eight of them, within a circle of a 50-mile radius, than anywhere else. Invasions across these frontiers have taken place in four wars within the last 125 years. The region has been called the "cockpit of Europe." The region shown on this map has seen the downfall of two Napoleons. At Waterloo (north central Belgium), 1815, Napoleon I lost his hopes of an empire covering most of Europe. At Sedan (south Belgian-French frontier) Louis Napoleon's troops broke in 1870 before Prussians, who later took Paris hours, noted on the Western front only "a little livelier artillery activity."

5,000 Reported in Surrender

In the east it said 289 Polish officers and about 5,000 men surrendered after the capitulation of Modlin and a quantity of war material had been captured.

Smashing successes and officially reported absence of any impressive signs of French activity in the west imparted a spirit of buoyancy in Germany which hitherto has been lacking. Thus far successes in the east were discounted by the question: What will the western powers do?

All this has been changed visibly in the past few days.

Think France Won't Fight

Rightly or wrongly, the German leadership and the German people seemed convinced France doesn't intend to fight seriously. As to Britain, reports of successes of German bombers and submarines encouraged the hope that Germany can look calmly upon conflict with the British Empire, especially if Soviet Russia deems it necessary to fight on the German side.

One indication of this confidence was seen in the fact that Hitler today for the first time ordered flags to be displayed on the day when German troops occupy Warsaw and for the six days following. Thus far no flag has been displayed, no matter how stupendous the victories in Poland.

Another indication of confidence was Hitler's calling the Reichstag. It is considered certain he will give an account of the Polish campaign, together with a possible announcement of how Germany intends to administer this conquered country.

Seek to Dissuade British

Between now and the calling of the Reichstag, it was learned from informed sources, German diplomacy will be hard at work to persuade Britain to desist from prosecuting the war further.

Germans with a thorough knowledge of the situation believe, however, that the ruthless campaign of sinking British ships must go on a short time at least before Britain will deem it the better part of wisdom to make peace.

Still others—especially among whom are men who have served the German government in some form or other in the British Empire—warn against such optimism and say the British are slow to get started, but exceedingly stubborn once they are aroused. These men forsee a long struggle between Britain and Germany.

Official Comment

German diplomatic activity doesn't mean, however, well-informed circles argue, that Germany or Russia will make another peace offer beyond that contained in their joint declaration.

The semiofficial Dienst aus Deutschland commentary said on this point, "evidently the opinion prevails in Berlin that London and Paris have been sufficiently informed concerning Germany's readiness to keep peace in Western Europe and that they can, if desired, learn further details through those friendly powers of which the German-Russian declaration spoke."

Duce Keeps Self Free

Rome, Sept. 30 (AP).—Foreign circles today predicted early developments in the German-Russian peace gestures toward Britain and France.

These circles saw Ciano's journey as evidence of an effort to enlist Italian co-operation in the drive for peace on the basis of Poland's partition launched by the German-Russia accord of Moscow.

Since Hitler was assumed to be aware that this drive might fail, in view of the hostile reaction in London and Paris to the Moscow declaration, many observers believed Hitler also would discuss with Ciano the chances of Italy entering the war on the German side.

Mussolini has kept himself free to serve as a mediator by declaring Italy's refusal to take the initiative in military operations while advocating British-French acceptance of Poland's partition by Germany and Russia.

So far as is known in foreign circles there is nothing to indicate Mussolini intends to throw Italy into war on Germany's side if Britain and France formally reject any peace proposals.

In a speech tonight to Genoese leaders, Il Duce ignored the international situation, confining his talk to internal duties of the party.

Mussolini appeared briefly on the balcony of his palace and saluted the crowd below in the Piazza Venezia.

Germans Claim Turkey

Berlin, Sept. 30 (INS).—Despite the fact that a Turkish military mission is en route to London and reports indicate Turkey shortly will sign mutual assistance pacts with Britain and France, Nazi quarters insisted tonight that Turkey "by force of circumstances and geographical position" is being drawn into the Russo-German camp.

Myrrha Soucek Dies in New York

Miss Myrrha Soucek, executive of the Thomas W. Briggs advertising firm, died Thursday at Polyclinic Hospital, New York City, it was learned here yesterday.

A native of Medford, Okla., Miss Soucek was a sister of Lieut. Comdr. Apollo Soucek, of Washington, former holder of the world's altitude record, and Lieut. Zeus Soucek, of Glen Ridge, N. J., an executive of an engineering research company. Miss Soucek was well known as a leader of Welcome Wagon hostesses throughout the United States and Canada.

Nazis or Germans, Briton Will Ask

London, Sept. 30.—Prime Minister Chamberlain will be asked Monday in Parliament whether Britain's enemies cannot be spoken of as Nazies instead of Germans, so as to distinguish those Germans who are on England's side. The question will be posed by Commander Oliver Locker-Lampson.

Japanese General Calls Siegfried Line Impregnable

Berlin, Sept. 30 (AP).—Gen. Count Juichi Terauchi, former commander-in-chief of Japanese armies in North China, said today he believed Germany's Siegfried Line, if "occupied by competent troops," would be impregnable.

Terauchi, an ex-war minister and now member of Japan's supreme war council, has just returned from a tour of the Westwall, after a visit at the Polish front, where he talked with Adolf Hitler.

"The German west fortifications are a military work of art," said Terauchi.

"The apparent disorderly system of bunkers, trenches, artillery emplacements, tank hindrances and fortifications reveals itself on closer examination as a vibrant organism in which each element synchronizes with the other and in which every eventuality had been previously weighed."

Police Go Back To School Today At Fort Meade

Baltimore, Sept. 30 (AP).—A selected detail of State, city and county police officers will go back to school tomorrow for a five-week training period in the fine points of preserving the peace and safety of Maryland residents.

The school, at Fort Meade, will draw between 50 and 75 men, Col. Beverly Ober, superintendent of State police said. Invitations were extended to all city and county police forces in the State, asking them to detail one or more men to the course.

State police probationers and those on the eligible list for appointment to existing vacancies will be among those trained.

Col. Ober said the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Army and several State agencies had co-operated to furnish equipment and instructors.

Forty-five lectures are on the program, and, as a new feature, speeches of these men will be recorded and preserved in the police library for future reference.

First Lady Hopes For Peace Crusade

New York, Sept. 30 (AP).—Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt said today she hoped the women of the "world of tomorrow" would make peace "their great crusade."

"We know that in a world where there are people who are predominantly bent on using power and force the rest of the wowrld probably will have to use force too for a time," she said in a broadcast.

Writer Finds 100 Fires in Warsaw Ruins

Hardly a Building In Center of Capital Is Left Undamaged

By Melvin K. Whiteleather,
Associated Press Staff Writer

Warsaw, Sept. 30.—Warsaw is in ruins.

There is scarcely an undamaged building in the center of the Polish capital. The former Saxon palace on spacious Pilsudski Square in the heart of the city, which housed the Polish Foreign Office, has been shelled and burned.

Other buildings in the vicinity of the square suffered equally from shells and bombs. The city's two largest hotels are located there.

I circled twice tonight in a Junkers plane over the city whose roof was ripped open to the sky during the 20-day siege by German armies.

Hundred Fires Burning

It was a sad sight, first in the late afternoon and then at dusk as a red moon peered over the horizon casting a glow on the Vistula River.

At least a hundred fires were burning.

The largest was along the coal yard on the railway line to Berlin. From the air it looked like a highly illuminated boulevard. Smaller fires could be seen burning in all quarters of the city. Most of the buildings had already been gutted and only wisps of smoke arose from them.

The railway station in Praga, Warsaw's easteren section, was burning, but two iron bridges over the Vistula, connecting Praga with Warsaw proper, were intact.

Bitter fighting took place in Praga before the capital was shelled heavily and tonight it was a trench town. Trenches zig-zagged along the streets and back yards. They even were dug in front of apartment house doors so it was possible to step from the front door into a trench.

Praga's buildings had their sides blown out and their roofs caved in but this destruction was a bagatelle compared with what I saw when I got across the Vistula and looked down on an entire city lying under piles of bricks, plaster and charred debris.

A long line of bedraggled Polish soldiers, unarmed, marched in good order westward out of the city. They had stacked their guns. The first group of thousands of Polish soldiers, who held the city until it was battered to pieces and forced to surrender September 27, left last night. The last are due to depart tomorrow night.

Streets Almost Deserted

Outside the city they are met by Germans and taken prisoner. German troops are scheduled to occupy the city October 2. So far no important body of Germans has entered the central part of Warsaw.

The streets are practically deserted. A few hundred persons milled about Pilsudski Square and half a dozen automobiles were seen in various parts of the city.

I flew to Warsaw from Brest-Litovsk after spending two and a half days watching the Russian army march into eastern Poland. The Russians have not advanced farther than Brest-Litovsk.

The Soviets are moving slowly and in masses. German troops have not yet withdrawn completely beyond the military demarcation lines, but only small detachments were seen east of the Vistula.

The pilot brought our tri-motored plane down between bomb-made holes in the Okecie Airport, on the southwestern edge of Warsaw.

Four happy Germans among the passengers climbed out. They had been among the 6,000 Germans living in Poland and had been held prisoners in a Polish concentration camp in Beresa Kartuska, 80 miles from the Russian border.

Three Germans In Graves

Released by Russians who emptied the camp September 17, they were found by a German military commission sent by Marshal Goering in agreement with Russian Defense Commissar Voroshiloff to investigate a report that 12 airmen had been taken prisoner and shot in the camp.

The report was proven false, but the graves of there German civilians were found by the Germans.

Hundreds of Germans from Posen, Silesia and the Polish Corridor who were in the camp are wandering about eastern Poland awaiting an opportunity to get home.

back to the barracks and we waited to see what the German military commander in Kremnica would do about it.

Talked and Sang

"Word came that we would be court martialed and shot unless we obeyed the German order. But we didn't move. All night we sat up talking and singing. We didn't know what the morning would bring but we were ready to face the worst."

The informant, a man in his thirties, struggled for words to describe those tense hours in Kremniera Barracks.

"Csatlos saved us; we owe our lives to him," he continued. "The Germans made him put the Slovak army into the war but I know he did everything possible to save his troops in the front line, and he wouldn't let the Germans take revenge on our regiment.

"Csatlos knew how we felt. In 1917 he went over from the Austrian-Hungarian army to the Czech legions in Russia. He still is a true Slovak. When he came to Kremnica the Germans stopped their threats.

"Glad It's Over"

"He gave most of the regiment three weeks' leave and others were transferred. None went to the front. Soon the war finished. I tell you we're glad it's over."

That account of the bloodless mutiny was the only trustworthy story of outright opposition to German domination which I found on trip across the breadth of Slovakia from the Hungarian border of what was Poland. (Nominally independent, Slovakia has placed herself under German "military protection.")

It was officially confirmed, however, that the Slovak army was employed on only a limited front and assigned to only minor objectives.

The Slovak propaganda ministry released a photograph showing a regiment containing a German minority receiving honors from Csatlos after front line action. The soldiers wore white armbands with a black swastika but otherwise their apparel was the regular Slovak uniform including belt buckles bearing the imprint of the Czech lion.

No Slovak Wounded

A four-story hotel in Zilina is now a base hospital for German wounded. There were no Slovak wounded apparent in the town, which remains under strict German military rule.

Genarally, the Slovak civilian population seems to have avoided conflict with German wartime measures, and there was considerable fraternization with the young German troops. The fact that these youaths were chieffy from Austria with a happy-go-lucky background instead of a rigorous Prussian tradition apparently helped to make for amicable relations with the Slovaks.

Demobilized Slovak soldiers steadily stream through Zilina toward their homes in the south; German trucks are hauling guns and other equipment from arsenals here back to Austria, possibly for use on the Western front.

$6,000 Is Cabled To War Children

Special Dispatch to The Post

New York, Sept. 30.—A $6,000 money order for the aid of children in belligerent nations has been cabled by the Foster Parent's Plan for War Children here to the organization's office in Biarritz, Eric G. Muggeride, executive secretary, announced yesterday.

Muggeridge, whose organization was formerly called the Foster Parents' Plan for Spanish Children, said he is seeking to raise $100,000 for trucks, medical supplies, and food for children of the warring nations.

The Foster Parents' plan is operating eight colonies for Spanish children in France, with the financial support of numerous Americans.

ish interests in that part of the world and forcing withdrawal of large forces of British troops from France.

Despite recent propaganda drives by Germany in Turkey, belief persisted here that that country would stick to her verbal promises.

Reports reaching here are that the Germans have been making strongest efforts to counteract an anti-German feeling in Turkey by titillating army officers with tempting pictures of benefits to be gained from territorial revision and with Iraq and Syria incorporated into the country which guards the Bosporus and is the key to British power in the Near East.

Great Britain and France are painted as the defenders of status quo, while Germany is held up as the supporter of territorial revision but while some converts were won in the army, it is said that the Ankara government is impervious to efforts to drive a wedge between them and the western democracies.

Hint European Sphere

However, the Russo-German understanding lent weight to arguments of the propagandists. Germany's latest proposals to Turkey, it was said, stressed the advantage of continued friendship with Russia and suggested the acquisition not only of Iraq and Syria but possibly a European sphere of influence in Bulgaria as well.

The interest of Turkey in friendly co-operation of the Balkans is understandable and natural. She is bound to Greece by ties believed to be the equivalent of an alliance. With Greece, Yugoslavia and Rumania, she is a member of the Balkan Entente which was formed in Athens more than five years ago.

What effect the threat of extension of Soviet's sphere of influence into the Balkans would have upon Italy's attitude is a question of considerable interest and importance. Italy has long cherished the establishment of a strong Balkan bloc under her wing and whether that is another ambition Premier Mussolini must relinquish is something that his son-in-law, Count Ciano, may learn while in Berlin.

There is some speculation here regarding the expected peace terms and the manner that they are to be presented. Most observers believe Hitler is setting the stage for the Allies to choose between the rosy picture of a return to peace and the gloomy prospect of a long war and ultimate defeat which he will dress up with all the oratory at his command. The choice seems to have been made. Great Britain is planning to fight on, but she does not contemplate defeat.

Continue Friendship With Russia

London, Sept. 30 (AP).—News that mutual assistance and economic agreements with Turkey are ready for signature and that a five-man Turkish military mission headed by Gen. Kiazim Obay is en route to London was printed widely today. Receiving less prominence were reports that the pacts contain a clause canceling Turkish commitments if Britain and Soviet Russia go to war.

Although official comment was withheld, persons usually well-informed said that London regarded such an attitude on the part of Turkey as natural because the friendship between Turkey and Russia was indispensable economically and strategically to both countries.

The same sources predicted that the government would make a statement on the progress of British-Turkish alliance negotiations within three days but that this would not deal with recent Russian-Turkish talks in Moscow.

On Monday or Tuesday Chamberlain will tell Commons what he thinks of the Soviet-German agreement which partitioned Poland anew between her conquerors and proclaimed a basis for "durable" peace.

Authoritative sources insisted that the British view of Soviet policy is unchanged.

WAR and PRICES

It is an economic fact that retail prices rise during war times. And this is true whether such war involves us or others.

Certain raw materials that go into the making of some of our Nation's merchandise do, of necessity, come from other countries, and such materials are higher now.

WE DO NOT BELIEVE IT WILL BE NECESSARY FOR US TO RAISE PRICES ON LIFETIME FURNITURE GENERALLY IN THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE. We have "covered" at favorable prices on a considerable amount of Lifetime Furniture for practically every American furnishing problem. Prices may have to be adjusted from time to time but only to the extent that it is absolutely necessary.

While we assure you that our present stocks are unusually large and will be offered you on the basis of the low prices we paid, the daily arrival of announcements from mills and manufactories that their prices have advanced suggests that thrifty people would like to know of this condition.

Far be it from Mayer & Co. to suggest that anyone buy more than they actually need. We much prefer a steady, normal business. But we do believe it smart to look now to your furniture needs.

Daladier Sees Army, Navy, Air Commanders

Poilus Take 3 More Towns; Now Hold 50 Between Main Lines

By Taylor Henry,
Associated Press Staff Writer

Paris, Sept. 30.—Ranking commanders of France's army, navy and air force met Premier Daladier today for an hour and a half review of the first four weeks of the war.

Immediately after the conference Daladier went to the Elysee Palace to report to President Lebrun.

This, in brief, is what the first month of the war showed:

On land the Polish front has completely disappeared under the joint German-Russian invasion, thereby releasing German troops and planes for action against France and Britain in the west.

Methodical French advances on the Western Front partly cleared out the no-man's land separating the Maginot and Siegfried lines of fortifications by driving a series of salients, the deepest of which was a scant seven miles on German soil.

Two of these salients, however—one on either side of the industrial city of Saarbruecken—were reported by French military commentators to have three-fourth encircled the capital of the Saar mining basin.

U-boats Under Control

On the sea the French and British fleets established a convoy system which was asserted to have assured reasonable safety for their shipping, despite continuing activity of German submarines.

The French pointed to safe arrival at Le Havre yesterday of the liners Champlain, De Grasse and Colombie after trips across the Atlantic as an indication that German submarines were being brought under control.

The French and British assert they have sunk at least a dozen submarines and halted more than 100,000 tons of contraband consigned to German ports.

In the air, Germany's fleets of planes, which had been one of the mysteries of the war, had everything their own way in Poland, but in the west—possibly because the Germans were so occupied in the east—French and British planes have been meeting them on an equal footing.

Although no total figures have been made public for the Western Front, partial figures issued by the French left the impression that their losses were only approximately half those of the Germans in a series of almost daily dogfights over the front. American-built Curtiss planes have been doing their share for the French.

Nazis Increasing Patrols

British planes, it was announced, have carried out one raid against the German fleet at Wilhelmshaven and have repeatedly "bombed" German towns with pamphlets, while French long-range scouting ships have been flying deep in German territory to observe troop movements.

On the last day of the war's first month the tactical situation along the Western Front, which now has become the only fighting front, showed little change.

Activity was restricted to artillery duels and local skirmishes between advancing French and German patrols who were hampering the French penetration of German territory.

The Germans today were reported increasing the strength of their patrols in sectors on both sides of Saarbruecken, where the French have driven their most important salient, and along a 3-mile-wide plateau north of the French town of Wissembourg.

French military commentators maintained, however, that German patrols showed themselves to be extremely prudent by withdrawing at the first burst of machine-gun fire from French outposts.

French Take 3 Towns

Paris, Sept. 30 (INS).—French tanks and infantry tonight were reported to have occupied three more Nazi towns in a swift offensive east of the Moselle River skirting the Luxemburg-German frontier.

The French drive, launched from the Maginot Line base at Sierck, occupied Perl, Oberperl and Sahndorf and then pushed front line Siegfried troops back nearly 2 miles along the railway linking Thionville and Trier, according to dispatches from Luxemburg.

With a total of at least 50 towns and villages in French hands between the Moselle and Rhine rivers, the new French action along the Luxemburg border seemed aimed at Trier, vital German railway and communications base, 35 miles from Perl.

A message from Schengen, Luxemburg, almost exactly at the point where the French, German and Luxemburg frontiers meet, said Nazi troops were forced to withdraw to the heights fronting Borg and above Besch.

Belgian Attack Feared

Possibility that the awaited German counterattack may be aimed at the frontiers of Belgium and Holland was seen again tonight in a Paris Soir dispatch from Luxemburg.

The dispatch said the newspaper had learned that Belgian troops who had been stationed along the French frontier were quitting their positions under urgent orders and being transferred northward to Holland's borders.

"There is a renewal of defense work all along Belgium's frontier, Albert Canal and the Demer River," Paris Soir asserted.

Nazi forces were believed by French officials to be preparing for a strong counterattack between Saarbruecken and Wissembourg. Heavy Nazi artillery fire was reported from that sector.

But officials said "it will unquestionably be difficult for the Germans to keep Saarbrucken inside their lines long."

treaties and banquets notwithstanding. Von Ribbentrop was received and as a result of the visit the promise that Russia will supply Germany with goods, coupled with the promise to "consult" with her if they jointly are unable to make Britain and France abandon all their proclaimed aims, has extended in mercy to Hitlerism which they have sworn to destroy.

One or the other promise is an empty one—if not both. If the Soviet Union implements the implied threat of the word to "consult" and announces a military alliance with Nazism and makes war on the Franco-British alliance, in the same moment she is prohibited from supplying Germany both for the reasons of her own nedse and transport difficulties.

It is, of course, equally impossible for Germany to pay Russia. In exchange for these paper promises Von Ribbentrop had to yield to Russia the key to southeastern Europe as well as the Baltic while Russian Communist troops stand along the lines given them with propagandist facilities with the troops of Germany, Hungary and Rumania as well as among the population of Poland.

Turkish Fears a Factor

What may be the difficulty between the Russians and the Turks, it is only possible to conjecture, as yet, since no authentic information is available concerning the real object of their presence here.

Certainly Russia is endeavoring to neutralize the Dardanelles but the question is why and what is she prepared to offer Turkey in exchange.

It may well be that Russia invited the Turkish foreign minister in order to obtain a guarantee of the security of the Bankans, provided she is allowed to retake Bessarabia—the Rumanian province acquired from Russia after the revolution.

It may also be that Von Robbentrop objected to the plan or that he added certain demands on Germany's behalf which have alarmed the Turks more than did the original proposition. Certainly, Turkey's fear f either Russia or Germany increasing their influence in the Black Sea—or in the Balkans—is a permanent factor affecting her relations with both powers. The invitation to the British and French heads of missions tonight suggests she and the Balkan bloc may be prepared to resist proposals—doubtless on terms from the British and French.

Ribbentrop Made to Wait

An almost equally useful indication of the unreality of the Russo-German accord is the fact that Molotoff took care to secure the surrender of Estonia to demands made before receiving Von Ribbentrop.

Von Ribbentrop did not know what plans were made for him until Molotoff, after seeing Estonian Foreign Minister Karl Selter, who had actually arrived in Moscow after Von Ribbentrop, had been made to know that Molotoff desired an Estonian surrender to Soviet terms. Only then was Von Ribbentrop asked to visit the Kremlin to be confronted with a fait accompli.

Pravda's editorial today on the new Soviet-German pact is remarkable above all for the fact of studious omission of any reference to the one clause that has alarmed Russians and attracted notice abroad—the obligation of the two powers to "consult" in event the French and British refuse to lay down their arms on a Soviet demand.

Doubtless it is thought the best way of allaying the Russian people's obvious anxiety that they may be dragged into the war on Germany's side to make no further reference to the phrase that caused their alarm.

Dardanelles Pact Hinted

Moscow, Sept. 30 (AP).—Soviet Russia's shadow over the Balkans was thrown into sharper relief tonight by impending conferences with Rumania's foreign minister, Grigore Gafencu, and a staff of experts.

Some sources said the Rumanian's visit tended to confirm reports that Russia had assumed a dominant role in the Balkans and had been given a free hand there by Germany in exchange for assurances of raw materials and neutrality in the western European war.

Unofficial quarters said they had expected for some time that the Soviet government would demand return of Bessarabia, which Rumania gained from Russia as a result of the World War.

Meanwhile, there was a belief in some circles that Russia may have gained concessions in the Black Sea area from Turkey which controls the Dardanelles, vital entrance to the sea.

While Russia agreed in a declaration to co-operate with Germany and other "friendly powers" to try to compel Britain and France to make peace, diplomatic quarters expressed doubt the Russians had any intention to join Germany in the war if the peace maneuver should fail.

Associated Press WIREPHOTO

Diplomacy in European capitals has pushed the actual fighting into the background. Arrows show routes of the busy diplomats. In Moscow were representatives of Germany, Rumania and Turkey. Whether Turkey would close the Dardanelles to all warships was the No. 1 issue. Meanwhile, the German trade commission had completed its shopping around in Bucharest and moved to Budapest. The Rome tip of the axis was brought into the news by Hitler's call to Italy's Foreign Minister Ciano to hurry to Berlin for a conference

To Neutralize Black Sea

Budapest, Sept. 30 (AP).—Dispatches from Balkan capitals tonight indicated that Russia, under the cloak of her newly gained military advantages, continued to move swiftly in an apparent plan to neutralize the Black Sea area and extend her diplomatic influence throughout southeastern Europe.

Russian-Turkish negotiations have been followed closely by the announcement that Rumania would join in the Moscow talks, leading to the belief that a Black Sea pact under the direct guidance of Moscow was being framed.

Such a pact, if signed by Rumania and Bulgaria as well as Turkey and Russia, observers said, would have the immediate obvious consequence of establishing Soviet-German communications via the Black Sea and the Danube.

Moreover, it would firmly establish the Soviet state as the Dominant influence in an area where German influence has hitherto pressed for advantage, it was added.

Would Isolate Rumania

Rumania meanwhile reported what was interpreted as a new indication that Russia did not intend any further military action for the time being, relying instead on "pressure" possible through her newly gained frontiers.

It was reported without confirmation in Bucharest that Rumania had received assurances through a "third party" that her Bessarabian frontier would not be violated.

Observers said the presence of Soviet troops on Rumania's frontier afforded a cold, hard fact which could not be lightly ignored.

For Rumania, a Russian-Turkish pact denying the Dardanelles to belligerent nations would represent the final blow in isolation from western powers.

The question of Rumania's Black Sea ports was expected to be a major topic of the discussion when Foreign Minister Gafencu reaches Moscow.

Diplomatic circles here said they expected the Russians would ask for assurances that use of these ports would conflict in no way with Soviet policy, especially as such policy may involve supplies for Germany.

Reports persisted that the Rumanian-Bulgarian dispute over the Dobruja territory was being adjusted in order to win Bulgaria to the new Black Sea pact.

Ankara, Turkey, Sept. 30 (AP).—Turkey was reported reliably tonight to be ready to cancel her mutual assistance obligations to France and Britain if they go to war with Soviet Russia.

A clause providing such release was said to be contained in the new economic and military agreements which a Turkish military mission headed by Gen. Kiazim Orbay is taking to London. The mission left for the British capital tonight.

Nazis Reveal Plans to Torpedo Armed Merchant Ships Without Warning

man submarine warfare and you should be prepared to meet it.'"

"Rights"

London, Sept. 30 (U.P.).—The German broadcast as picked up unofficially quoted the Hamburger Fremdenblatt as saying that "in order that England may be in no doubt as to the possible consequences, we publish herewith the German conception of maritime warfare rights:

"1—Resistance by merchantmen against measures taken by submarines in accordance with prize right is forbidden.

"2—The fact that a merchantman is armed does not by itself automatically turn the ship into a man of war. On the other hand an adversary who is attacked by such an armed merchant vessel is legally justified to treat it as a man of war because it is equipped for war-like activities.

"3—Passengers of neutral states use armed merchantmen at their own risk."

The German broadcast said that the American neutrality bill now before the United States Congress making it obligatory for merchant vesels to carry only small fire arms was a point in support of the German position.

English Lose Ship In Week

By the Associated Press

A sharp decline in British losses, Nazi attacks on Scandinavian vessels and the opening of conflict between Britain's warships and Germany's bombing planes marked the fourth week of sea warfare ending yesterday.

England lost only one merchantmen—the Hazelside, torpedoed and shelled last Sunday near the Irish Coast—compared with 10 casualties during the first week of the new war, 11 in the second and 9 in the third.

The British declared the U-boats "have now been driven from thickly dotted shipping routes" and had "found the pace too hot for them." The French asserted 12 Nazi submarines had been destroyed.

Fuehrer Hitler was pictured saluting crews at their bases, and it was assumed many of the underwater craft were refueling and reloading with torpedoes after their initial forays.

Scandinavian Ship Searched

Germany's apparent inactivity around the British Isles contrasted with U-boat destruction of five Scandinavian vessels. Nazi warships seized three Danish merchant ships yesterday and took them to a German port after announcing that 45 vessels had been searched for contraband and "a number of them were captured."

Denmark Planned a Protest in Berlin.

At Helsinki, Finland, reports were received that the 2,141-ton Finnish steamer Satakunta had been seized yesterday by a German warship and taken to Hamburg. The vessel was en route to Belgium with a cargo of timber.

No sinkings were reported yesterday.

Twenty-eight days of fighting have produced the known destruction of 57 ships totaling 238,993 gross tons and the loss of at least 745 lives.

Losses by nations:

Belligerents: Britain, 31; Germany, 9; France, 2.

Neutrals: Norway, 4; Finland, 3; Sweden, 3; The Netherlands, 2; Belgium, 1; Russia, 1; Greece, 1.

Ex-Rail Chief Of Nazis Views U. S. Problems

Dr. Homberger Says More Modernizing, Unification Needed

American railways, as well as other forms of mass transportation, are likely to recover much of their lost economic stability in the expected industrial revival in the opinion of Dr. Ludwig M. Homberger, internationally known expert, who this fall joined the teaching staff of American University.

HOMBERGER

Formerly executive vice president of the German National Railways, Dr. Homberger has spent twenty-five years studying railroad and transportation problems in Europe and America. He had visited the United States for study purposes before coming to this country a year ago.

Unification of American railways systems, more widespread use of modern equipment, and efficient operation, Dr. Homberger believes, will prove the salvation of the railroads. He does not favor nationalization of the railways, although Germany and other European countries have taken their rail carriers out of private hands.

"We should not try to copy Europe," he said. "What may be good for one country may not benefit another."

Taught in Berlin

Dr. Homberger, who taught for many years in the Berlin Academy of Administration, has spent the past year studying American transportation and communication problems first hand. His work at American University will deal with both subjects.

"American railroads, so far as safety and service are concerned, are progressive and efficient," he said. "I did not like the old fashioned coaches and sleeping cars, but new streamlined cars, such as I saw at the World's Fair, are very attractive."

He pointed out that, because of the quick service offered by motor trucks, these carriers have taken away much of the hauling formerly done by the railroads.

Passenger business on the railroads, which has fallen off sharply in recent years, is likely to recover somewhat as business improves, Dr. Homberger believes, but not so rapidly or extensively as freight traffic.

Laws No Solution

The Nation's transportation problems will not be solved by legislation now pending in Congress, in Dr. Homberger's opinion, though it will bring some relief, especially in the regulation of water carriers.

"Nobody denies that, owing to the present organization of the American railroad system, much duplication of facilities still exists," he stated. "Bigger systems and united policies could provide for quicker service and greater economy.

"It would be very desirable if these evils should be overcome by voluntary action of the railroads but I have talked with many observers who believe that railroads will be reluctant to give up 'strategic positions' voluntarily."

Labor offers one of the biggest problems in modernizing the railways, Dr. Homberger pointed out, as application of economy usually reduces employment in the industry.

Until very recently, he continued, the outlook for American railroads did not appear very hopeful.

More Traffic Seen

"But now I feel that the situation has changed entirely," he said. "They will get what is badly needed—more traffic. The transportation agencies can easily handle much more traffic than they do now, by using idle capacity. The railroads have already placed orders for new equipment, and many workers have been recalled to the shops for repair work.

"Under these circumstances it seems not to be advisable to push through reorganization proceedings in the near future. The new legislation probably will make consolidation easier. Such projects can be worked out much better when everybody is hopeful.

"There is every reason to believe that the favorable trend of traffic will continue over a considerable period."

Dr. Homberger is author of several books on transportation topics, including one on management and finances of American railways. He has made a close study of British railways, which have kept out of receiverships even during depressions.

$1,000,000 Estate Is Bequeathed to Johns Hopkins U.

Pasadena, Calif., Sept. 30 (AP).—An estate of more than a million dollars has been left to Johns Hopkins University by Dr. John Martin Vincent, 81, retired professor of history, who died at La Jolla, Calif., a week ago.

His will, which has been filed for probate, provides that the residue of the estate, valued at approximately $1,500,000, shall go to the university after payment of bequests to relatives and the income shall be used for the benefit of the department of history. His wife died several years ago.

Dr. Vincent had led a quiet life here since he retired after 20 years as professor of European history at Johns Hopkins in 1925, and his friends were surprised to learn of his wealth.

Associates disclosed he had invested his savings of a few thousand dollars in stock of a chemical concern which since had pyramided in value.

Attack Thwarted In Md. Convent; Suspect Seized

Baltimore, Sept. 30 (AP).—A colored man accused of creeping into a convent bedroom, choking and threatening to kill a nun, was charged with burglary and attempted assault in police court today.

Police said the attack occurred in the St. Gregory's Convent occupied by the Sisters of Mercy who teach at the parish parochial school.

The sister, whose room was entered, testified at the hearing she was awakened when someone placed a hand on her throat. The intruder warned her not to scream, she said, and threatened to kill her if she did.

Disregarding the warning, she struggled and called for aid, arousing other sisters. Frightened by the uproar, the man fled.

A few minutes later, police found a colored man hiding in shrubbery in the convent garden. They identified him as Howard Diggs, 34.

Poles Set Up Government In France

President Moscicki Quits, Successor Takes Oath, Names Cabinet

By the Associated Press

Paris, Sept. 30.—A Polish government without a country was established officially in France today.

In a dramatic ceremony at the Polish Embassy, Wladyslaw Raczkiewicz, former president of the Warsaw senate, took the oath of office as president of the republic now divided between Germany and Russia.

He succeeded 71-year-old Dr. Ignace Moscicki, who has been held in internment in Rumania, where he fled before the German invaders.

(Dr. Moscicki tonight passed through Subotica, Yugoslavia, en route to France by way of Italy. He traveled as a private citizen.)

Moscicki's resignation from the presidency, which he had held since 1926, was announced through the embassy a few minutes before the new president took the oath.

Through inauguration of Rackiewicz, the Poles sought to outmaneuver what diplomats called Nazi efforts to prevent existence of a Polish government by keeping Moscicki in Rumania without power to exercise his functions.

Raczkiewicz's first act was to decree the resignation of the cabinet headed by Gen. Felice Slawoj-Skladkowski since it was unable to function from neutral Rumanian territory.

Gen. Wladislaw Sikorski was named premier, commander of the Polish forces and minister of military affairs. Sikorski formerly served as premier.

Other members of the new cabinet include Stanislaw Stronski, minister without portfolio and vice premier; August Zaleski, minister of foreign affairs, and Col. Adam Koc, minister of finances.

To Form United Front

The new president said three other members would be announced soon. He asserted they would be selected from the Socialist, Peoples Peasant and National Labor parties for a united front cabinet.

Present at the inaugural ceremony was a handful of Polish officials who had fled with Raczkiewicz to France. They included Koc, chief of the Polish military mission here, and Ambassador Julius Lukasiewicz.

The 54-year-old president took over his duties, the embassy said, "in conformity with constitutional law" embodied in a decree drafted September 17, 1939, at the Polish border town of Kuty after the government fled.

Rackiewicz has been head of the Alliance of Poles Abroad since 1936.

Biddle Expected to Stay

Ignace Paderewski, famed pianist and former Premier of Poland, was reported to have declined the presidency because of ill health.

The Ambassador to Poland, Anthony J. Drexel Biddle, jr., who has arrived here with his staff from Warsaw, was expected to remain in Paris and be accredited to the new government. Diplomats said final decision on this must be made in Washington.

Biddle has been given an office in the American Embassy while his counselor of Embassy, North Winship, has established headquarters in the center of Paris.

Earlier, it was disclosed by an influential neutral official that diplomatic efforts were being made by several nations to obtain release of Polish government members held in Rumania.

The neutral official said the Poles charged that Rumania's action in this matter was taken under a German threat to invade Rumania unless the Polish government was interned. Rumanians have asserted the Polish ministers were held because they were carrying on political activity on neutral soil.

Government Called "Farce"

Berlin, Sept. 30 (AP).—DNB, German official news agency, tonight said the establishment of a new Polish government abroad was a "farce." The agency said authority in former Poland now rests wholly in the hands of Germany and Russia. It added that the Polish government "deserted the nation" and that many Poles were content with the present situation.

Moscicki Resigns

Bucharest, Sept. 30 (U.P.).—Wladyslaw Roczkiewicz, Poland's new President, spent several days here in strictest secrecy and took with him to France the resignation of his predecessor, Ignacy Moscicki, it was learned tonight.

The new President also received from members of the old government the fallen republic's great state seal and important state documents necessary to set up his new government in Paris.

In contrast to opinion in diplomatic quarters, circles close to the Rumanian government expressed the opinion that Germany would not protest the resignation of Moscicki and his appointment of a successor while interned here.

Raczkiewicz lived at the home of friends during his secret visit to Bucharest, it was learned, leaving the city several times to confer with the Polish President.

Count Roger Raczynski, Polish ambassador to Rumania, returned to Bucharest late tonight and was expected to inform King Carol officially tomorrow that members of the Polish government interned here had resigned.

Partition Denounced

By the Associated Press

Ambassador Jerzy Potocki of Poland formally denounced to the State Department yesterday the German-Russian partition of his country.

In a statement delivered to James C. Dunn, State Department political advisor, the envoy declared the division violated existing treaties and would be resisted by the Polish government with all means at its disposal.

The ambassador's action posed for the United States the question what diplomatic attitude to take toward the latest disappearance of a European state. Diplomats expect this government will do as it did when Czecho-Slovakia was swallowed by Germany—refuse to recognize the conquest.

Officials here said informally that it appeared likely Ambassador Biddle would continue accredited to the Polish government.

No instructions have been sent him since the new Polish president took office in exile, it was said.

a group of milk dealers in the Chicago area. The Government is appealing the latter cases after defeats in the lower courts.

A. F. L. Is Appellant

One of the labor act cases involves an appeal by the American Federation of Labor from a ruling by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia favoring the C. I. O. The lower court held it did not have authority to pass on the Labor Board's certification of a C. I. O. union as the exclusive bargaining agency for for Pacific Coast longshoremen.

The apparent vigor of Chief Justice Hughes on his return to Washington has silenced speculation over the 77-year-old jurist's possible early retirement.

The Chief Justice begins his fifteenth year on the bench and his ninth as its head. He served as Associate Justice from October 10, 1910, until June 10, 1916, when he resigned to accept the Republican presidential nomination, running against President Wilson. In February, 1930, President Hoover named Hughes Chief Justice.

A Lawyer's Lawyer

In the nine years he has headed the judicial branch of the Government Hughes has had remarkable health. Not until this year had he missed a day in court. Known as a "lawyer's lawyer" because of the clarity and many citations in his decisions, Hughes is equally famous for his ability to cut short long-winded lawyers who hope to screen indefensible legal positions with verbiage. His mind sees directly to the issue involved, and an abrupt question from him has been known to deflate the "talking" lawyer in the midst of a peroration.

Only two of the justices have served longer than he—77-year-old Justice McReynolds, who has been a member of the court since 1914, and the ailing Justice Butler, who took his seat on the bench in January, 1923. Both have been described as conservative because of their votes against New Deal legislation.

Four Are "Freshmen"

Justice Stone, 66, and Justice Roberts, 64, are the two other "older men" on the bench. Stone has served 14 years and Roberts, 9.

The rest, known as "the freshmen" because of their relatively short service, were appointed by President Roosevelt. They are: Black, 53; Reed, 54; Frankfurter, 56, and Douglas, 40.

Frankfurter and Stone should show up in court with healthy tans as they have been spending the week-end with the President on Chesapeake Bay on the yacht Potomac. Both were accompanied by their wives. The party is expected to return to the Capital late today.

Neutrality Bill Fight Centers on Arms Credits Provisions

posal I think it would go through in a very short time."

He declared the credit provision was contrary to the wishes of the country at large and insisted "it was the debts piled up in the United States that were a substantial factor in getting us into the last war."

As reported by the Foreign Relations Committee the bill on which weeks-long debate will open tomorrow provides for repeal of the arms embargo, requires that shipments of American goods to belligerent countries be made in non-American vessels, and authorizes the President to designate combat zones in which American ships and citizens would not be permitted to travel.

Committee's Findings

The committee report on the measure, made public yesterday, declared that the Nation cannot maintain its neutrality "so long as the arms embargo remains on the statute books."

"And embargo on arms ammunition and implements of war," it added, "is contrary to the accepted precepts of international law which prescribe that any belligerent may purchase any articles or materials in any neutral country.

"Belligerents as well as neutrals have relied from time immemorial upon this law. It has for hundreds of years been recognized by both belligerents and neutrals to govern their conduct towards eaech other and is today so recognized by the governments of the world except the United States. The embargo was a voluntary departure from international law by the United States Government and cannot, in the opinion of this committee, be administered in an equitable or neutral manner nor serve to maintain the peace of the United States."

Burke Supprots Bill

Strong support came for the bill in a radio address last night by Senator Burke (Democrat) of Nebraska, who declared over a Nation-wide Columbia network:

"We have demonstrated that an arms embargo is undesirable and productive of no good results. A complete embargo is unwise and its consequence devastating. There is an alternative. Simple. Sensible. Sound. It is set forth in the pending substitute. It attempts no meaningless distinction between classes of goods. It recognizes the futility of discriminating between the raw material, the partly fabricatde article and the completed product. It says t oall the world that what we have for sale is ready for any purchaser without the slightest discrimination on our part. As far as we are concerned, all will be treated exactly alike.

"More than that this proposal goes to the very root of the evil we are trying to correct—the evil of involvement in war. Since certain counrties unfortunately are engaged in a titanic struggle which is not of our making and in which we do not propose to permit ourselves to become involved, we will not let our ships make deliveries to any of the belligerents. We will say to them, one and all alike, if you want that which we have for sale come and get it in your own ships. Title must pass to you here and it will not pass until payment has ben made. When you leave our territorial waters with the goods you have bought and paid for—wheat, oil, cotton, airplanes, or whatever they may be—we have no further responsibility. You take all the chance of a safe passage."

He commended President Roosevelt's "assumption" that all members of Congress are in favor of "such measures as will protect the neutrality, the safety and the integrity of our country and at the same time keep us out of war," and approved Secretary of State Hull's view that an embargo on the export of arms is undesirable. He quoted an editorial from The Post in concluding:

Adoption Anticipated

"'Realization that the neutrality law now on the statute books is neither neutral, nor in any way a deliable guarantee against war, explains the rising tide of sentiment for its amendment,' says The Washington Post. The Pittman bill is strictly neutral. It affords the most reliable guarantee against our involvement in war. It should be, and I have no doubt will be, promptly adopted."

As the Nation prepared for the debate opening tomorrow, Senator Byrnes (Democrat), of South Carolina, claimed 57 votes for the bill and predicted a total of 65 finally will be cast for it. Opposition leaders have privately set a maximum of 35 votes against the measure in their calculations, though Senator Nye (Republican), of North Dakota, insisted yesterday that by the time debate is concluded some weeks hence, the opposition would be strong enough to defeat the bill. Senator McCarran held the opposition had a chance to win if the 90-day credit provision is not taken from the committee draft.

Senator Taft (Republican), of Ohio, speaking on an N. B. C. network last night, asserted repeal of the arms embargo "is not in any way calculated to increase the chances of our getting into war."

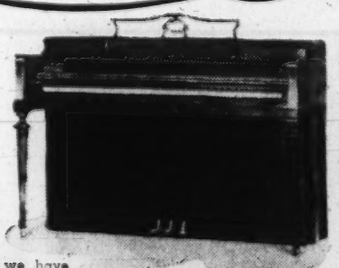
Fischer Pianos

FAMOUS SINCE 1863

New Colonial Model Spinet



Of the many spinet styles we have sold in the last few months the Fischer Colonial model has been the most popular. Distinctively styled, sturdily constructed and unusually well toned for a small piano, it is the type of instrument that you would expect craftsmen and a factory with a background of over 100 years' experience to build. Before you buy any piano see this distinctive little spinet and the other styles of the Fischer . . . a comparison will convince you of the value at their moderate price.

10 Are Injured In 2 Accidents In Maryland

Lights at Hospital Go Out as 7 Victims Are Being Treated

Ten persons were injured last night in two accidents in nearby Maryland.

Treatment of seven of the persons injured in a traffic mishap near Maryland University was impeded when electric lights at the Washington Sanitarium and Hospital at Takoma Park, Md., went out as a result of a heavy thunderstorm.

Members of the Silver Spring Rescue Squad arriving with Luther H. Golden, of Hyattsville, Md., slightly injured in another accident on Philadelphia avenue in Silver Spring, found hospital attaches working by candlelight. They brought in their emergency headlamps and soon were reinforced by the Takoma Park Rescue Squad.

Auto Strikes Tree

The injured persons were members of the family of Mrs. David Nusbaum, 4022 Georgia avenue northwest, and were riding n a car operated by her daughter-in-law Mrs. Clement Nusbaum, which ran into a tree in University lane. They were brought to the hospital by the Branchville Rescue Squad. The Nusbaum car had been en route to Greenbelt, Md., carrying a daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Leon Malkin and their girl baby, Sidney, to their home.

Mrs. David Nusbaum suffered a broken right shoulder; Leon Malkin, face injuries; Mrs. Malkin, minor injuries; Sidney Malkin, broken leg; Miss Rose Nusbaum, bad cut on head; Miss Hannah Malkin, broken leg; Mrs. Clement Nusbaum, severe shock.

Nearly a score of persons were shaken up, three requiring hospital treatment, when a Washington-bound Greyhound bus collided with a trailer truck in the height of the storm near Berwyn, Md. An ambulance bearing some of the injured later was in collision at Ninth street and Maryland avenue northeast.

Water Stalls Car

Water had formed in a depression in the road, causing an unidentified automobile to stall. The trailer truck driver, James Fred Jordan, of Hamlet, N. C., jammed on his brakes to avoid striking the car. The bus, following the trailer-truck, skidded sidewise when its driver applied his brakes and the side of the bus struck the trailer-truck, tearing open the bus side.

Ambulances of the Bladensburg and Branchville Rescue Squads carried the injured to Casualty Hospital. En route, the Branchville ambulance was in collision with a car operated by Elizabeth Cross, 904 F street northeast. No one was injured and no charges were filed.

Those treated at Casualty were: Gladys Forkner, of Kershaw, S. C., head injuries and brush burns on the body; John Wilson, 1146 Seventeenth street northwest, laceration on foot; Helen Hamilton, Kershaw, S. C., face injuries.

Several other passengers were given first aid by the rescue squads at the scene.

The truckdriver and Robert B. Battle, 1707 Capital street northeast, operator of the bus, were held on technical charges of reckless driving by Justice of the Peace G. S. Phillips, Berwyn, and released on $100 bond.

Ward, Montgomery Veteran, Dies

Charles L. Ward, 44, World War veteran and life-long resident of Montgomery County, Md., died Friday at Mount Alto Hospital after a week's illness.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Daisy E. Ward, and four children, Hazel, Jean, Charles and Mervin Ward, all of Gaithersburg. He also leaves two sisters, Mrs. Arthur Nicholson, Gaithersburg, and Mrs. Jerry Williams, Etchison, Md., and three brothers, Harold W., Irvin and Sprigg Ward, all of Gaithersburg.

The funeral will be at 1:30 p. m. today from the funeral home of W. Reuben Pumphrey, Rockville. Burial will be in Forest Oak Cemetery, Gaithersburg. Mr. Ward, who served overseas during the World War, was a member of the Barber-Briggs American Legion Post of Gaithersburg.

Charles Town, W. Va., Sept. 30.—James P. Pearrell, of Martinsburg, W. Va., driver of a truck that struck and fatally injured Clarence H. Stottlemeyer, of this city, farm worker, Wednesday evening on the highway near here, was exonerated by a coroner's jury yesterday.

The Federal Diary

Thousands of Shad Die Beneath Police Station; The Officers Call for Aid, Mention Congress

By Alfred Friendly.

Fred J. Orsinger, guiding spirit of the Fisheries Bureau aquarium, met, but did not solve a crisis at the Harbor Police Station Friday.

The trouble, disturbed policemen reported to him, arose from a massacre of unprecedented proportions among fingerling Potomac hickory shad, with the shore below the station becoming the victims' cemetery. A hot afternoon, they implied, was not helping matters any.

The professor of piscatorial science sped to the scene and staged an impromptu inquest, splashing around ankle-deep in thousands and thousands of exceedingly dead fingerlings.

"I would guess," said Orsinger, starting to take a deep breath, but thinking better of it, "that the immediate reason for the mortality is either pollution of the water, a wave of mass suicide among mud shad, he explosion of a sardine factory nearby, or natural causes. Inquest adjourned."

"Whew!" said a policeman. "Who cares what they died of, so long as they're dead? This is supposed to be a police station, not the answer to a fertilizer factory's prayer. How do you get rid of these things?"

"You might petition Congress," said Orsinger, "either for a cargo of Christmas Night or a good high tide."

Harold Ickes, since the President's reorganization order holder of dominion over fish of the sea and birds of the air, and land animals as well, has been advised by his indefatigable Biological Survey researchers that prairie dogs are vegetarians.

The implication of this discovery, is that the rodents compete with livestick on the grazing ranges and are thus "something of a conservation problem." They should be exterminated, the survey intimates.

Elmer F. Andrews, wage and hour administrator soon to bee displaced, was offered, and refused, the lower paying post of alien property custodian in the Justice Department, vacated during the summer by Urey Woodson, on the ground that the work to be done had been finished.

Andrews has the reputation of being so unwilling to antagonize anyone that he can see liberal labor leader Sidney Hillman and anti-New Deal Senator George on the same day and on the same matter, and send them both away satisfied.

NORMALY NOTE: The AFGE and UFWA are still bickering, a reassuring omen at a time when other routine happenings are few and far between.

Subject of the current controversy is who was responsible for the Budget Bureau's plan to survey Government agencies in order to work out a fair promotion plan. UFWA hinted it was a "power behind the scenes." AFGE yesterday announced the program was "the direct outgrowth" of its own recent activities.

When the matter reaches the Supreme court for decision, we will let you know.

Virginia College To Give Award to Mrs. Cordell Hull

Staunton, Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—The Algernon Sydney Sullivan award for distinguished service will be awarded Mrs. Cordell Hull, alumna of Mary Baldwin College, at a ceremony October 4 opening the institution's ninty-eighth Founder's Day program. Dr. Francis Pendleton Gaines, president of Washington and Lee University, will make an address.

The Sullivan award to Mrs. Hull was announced at commencement last June but the recipient could not be present because she and her husband, the Secretary of State, were greeting King George and Queen Elizabeth at the Canadian border.

Mrs. Hull attended Mary Baldwin for four years, beginning in 1890.

Arlington Church Program Is Given

Services today at St. George's Episcopal Church, Arlington County, will be as follows: Holy Communion, 7:30 a. m.; church school and Bible classes, 9:45; Holy Communion and sermon by the Rev. Henry J. Miller, "The Fruits of The Spirit," at 11; Young People's League, Parish Hall, 7 p. m.

'Starving,' Says Note Under Stamp Of German Letter

Special Dispatch to The Post

Martinsburg, W. Va., Sept. 30.—"We are starving," was the sentence under a stamp attached to a letter received here this week by a resident from friends in Germany.

A closing paragraph of the letter, which passed the censor, said "Everything is going on as usual but the men are in service. Save the stamp."

When the stamp was removed, the inscription was found.

Signs of Mild Winter Seen by Mountaineer

Special Dispatch to The Post

Martinsburg, W. Va., Sept. 30.—Hannis Porter, veteran mountain man and with a regional reputation as a weather prognosticator, said today his observations this fall of bird, animal and plant life lead him to forecast a mild winter.

Hornets' nests point north; ant hills are about an inch higher than a year ago; the colorig of caterpillars—a solid color this year against variations when there are to be variable degrees of cold weather—are among the signs he reads this year.

County C. E. U. Elects Lola May as Leader

Hagerstown, Md., Sept. 30.—Miss Lola May has been elected president of the Washington County Christian Endeavor Union at the annual convention here. Other officers named were: vice presidents, George Williams, Bernice Lowry, Elmer Deeds and Donald Warrenfeltz; secretaries, Lethan Rowe and Madeline Spickler; treasurer, Donald Warrenfeltz; ministrerial advisor, Rev. William S. Hess; junior superintendent, Erma Itnyer; intermediate superintendent, Mrs. G. C. Bradley.

3 Hurt in Crash

Martinsburg, W. Va., Sept. 30.—Mr. and Mrs. Jerry Hettenhouser and Lawrence Bowen were under physicians' care at their home here today as a result of their automobile overturning on the State road between here and Berkeley Springs yesterday.

Obstacle Removed To Restoration of Appomattox Field

Richmond, Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—Miss Eula May Burke, chairman of the Appomattox restoration committee, announced today that an agreement had been reached between the National Park Service and Mrs. Bessie Rosser Ferguson, of Appomattox, for the acquisition of her home place at old Appomattox Courthouse.

Completion of the negotiations removes the last obstacle in the way of an early restoration of the historic Appomattox battlefield area.

The sum of $100,000 was made available by Congress several years ago for the development.

95th Anniversary of Y.M.C.A. To Be Observed Next Week

Washington Unit Founded Only 8 Years After Sir George Williams Established Original Chapter of Agency in London

The ninety-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Young Men's Christian Association and the 118th birthday of its founder, Sir George Williams, will be celebrated here by the Central Y. M. C. A. beginning Wednesday.

An "open house" for newspapermen and radio announcers, with indoor baseball games and swimming, will start the fetsivities. Thursday, employes at the Little Tavern will hold "Little Tavern Night."

Sunday, the anniversaries will be observed in local churches, featuring special Y. M. C. A. programs. On October 9, a special program will be presented for employes of local stores. The opening fall concert will be given October 10.

Membership Campaign

The annual membership campaign will swing into action October 11, with the goal of 1,200 additional members. October 11 is the anniversary of Sir George's birth.

Started Here in 1853

The Washington Y. M. C. A. was founded in April, 1852, eight years after Sir George founded the world's first "Y" in London, and one year after America's first Y. M. C. A. was founded in Montreal. Original membership was 40. It increased to 92 in one week. Today the average membership of the Central "Y" is 3,500.

There is a total attendance of 225,000 annually in the physcial department, and an attendance of more than 80,000 ananually at religious meetings. More than 7,000 guests annually utilize the rooms and dormitories at 1736 G street northwest.

Entries Rounded Up For Beauty Queen And Parade

Amiable spooks will rout specters of war from Washington as a Hallowe'en celebration on October 31 gives outlet for gaiety.

Busily mobilizing merriment, sub-committees have been appointed to make plans, John J. Hasley, general chairman of the Hallowe'en committee, said yesterday.

Potential queens may now get entry blanks for that contest, and applications also are ready for parade entries. Blanks may be obtained from Catherine Cooke, assistant secretary of the Hallowe'en committee, 204 Star Building. Prizes and trophies are being rounded up by the chairman of that committee, Sergt. Bert Sheldon of the Metropolitan Police.

Five thousand seats for merry-makers will be available for 25 cents each, to go on sale probably next week.

Plane in Flight To Pick Up Mail At Session Here

Mail pick-up and delivery by a plane in flight will be demonstrated October 12 on the Mall between Fifth and Sixth streets northwest while the National Convention of Postmasters is in session here.

Flying about 70 feet above the ground, the plane will drop a pouch of mail and pick up another with "hook and line," announced officials of All American Aviation, sponsor of the demonstration.

Besides the postmaster, members of Congress, Postoffice Department officials and members of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, the exhibition will be viewed by ranking authorities of the War and Navy Departments. The mail pick-up and delivery service is in operation in 38 easter communities.

Puppet Show To Teach Children Care of Teeth

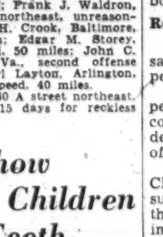
The District Dental Society tomorrow will begin presentation of the Noah's Ark dental puppet show to elementary school children as a means of educating children in the care of their teeth.

Dr. A. Harry Ostrow, director of dental services for the Health Department, announced yesterday the presentation is part of the Good Teeth Council for children's visual educational projects in dental health. F. Keith Burns, the lecturer-sculptor models four of the animals which sailed on the ark. The following schedule has been arranged by Dr. Ostrow:

Tomorrow, Holy Comforter, 9 a. m. and 11 a. m.; St. Joseph's at 2 p. m. Tuesday; Holy Name, 9 a. m. and 11 a. m.; Immaculate Conception, 2 p. m. Wedensday; St. Anthony, 9 a. m. and 11 a. m.; St. Stephen at 2 p. m. Thursday; St. Gabriel, 9 a. m. and 11 a. m.; St. Peter, 2 p. m. Friday; St. Peter, 9 a. m.; St. Teresa, 11 a. m., and Blessed Sacrament, 2 p. m.

Lloyd C. Douglas, Author, to Speak At Church Fete

Lloyd C. Douglas, author of "Magnificent Obsession" and other best-sellers, will lecture this week at the First Congregational Church in connection with a diamond jubilee celebration.



DOUGLAS

Douglas, who served as pastor of Luther Place Memorial Church, Thomas circle, from 1909 to 1911, and later embraced the Congregational faith, will speak four nights, beginning Tuesday at 8 p. m., under the general theme of "Adventures and Defenses." He will be introduced on the opening night by Harvey W. Goddard, chairman of the seventy-fifth anniversary committee.

The First Church today co-operates with the National Loyalty Day movement, which is indorsed by President Roosevelt and planned to encourage church attendance. Dr. Howard Stone Anderson will preach at 11 a. m. on "Your Goal Is the Sea," and at 8 p. m. Senator Frazier (Republican), of North Dakota, will deliver an address on "Keep the Embargo—and Keep Out of War."

Couple on Golden Wedding Attribute Happiness to Pies

MR. AND MRS. EDWARD CURTIS ANDERSON

Mrs. Anderson Won't Guess How Many Of Apple Variety She Has Baked Over 50 Years; 20-Pound Cake on Hand

Mrs. Edward Curtis Anderson, looking forward to her golden wedding anniversary today, was at a loss yesterday to prescribe a sure-fire formula for a half century of wedding bliss. Unless—well, being a good pie baker does no harm.

With becoming modesty, Mrs. Anderson did not claim to be a good pie baker but the gleam that came into her husband's eye when the subject was mentioned testified that she was—and still is.

"She just finisheLd baking an apple pie," joined in Mr. Anderson. "That's my favorie—apple."

"But you wouldn't dare print the number of pies I used to make for him when we were first married," his wife said with a grin.

The couple will be the center of attraction this afternoon at a reception in their home, 600 Nicholson street northwest, where they live with a daughter Mrs. L. H. Middlekauff. Their other child, Mrs. Velma Davis, of Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y., three grandchildren and two great grandchildren also will be there.

Mr. and Mrs. Anderson have lived in Washington 43 years. In 1937 he was retired from the Bureau of Internal Revenue after 41 years of Government service.

Today they will cut a 20-pound wedding cake and Mrs. Anderson will receive the first wedding ring she has ever had. At the presentation ceremony, the Rev. Henry W. Snyder, pastor of St. Paul's English Lutheran Church, will give a talk.

Pope Urges Poles To Maintain Faith

this war, from which all of our efforts so persistently and ardently, but nevertheless futilely, sought to preserve from Europe."

He appealed to the bishops and clergy to continue their work in Poland and said he hoped for the preservation of liberty of worship, the Catholic press, charitable institutions, social work and religious instruction.

Polish Cardinal Present

August Cardinal Hlond, Primate of Poland, stood beside the Pope as he bestowed his apostolic blessing on the Polish people.

Many of those in the audience, mostly nuns and priests, wept at the Pope's words.

When he finished speaking, the Pope stepped down from his dais and stood in rapt attention as the gathering sang "May God Protect Poland," the hymn with which the Poles have comforted themselves in previous partitions of their homeland by foreign powers.

The Pope spoke of the Poles' military valor, their ten centuries of "defending Christian Europe" and their great religious faith.

He added that the Polish people had lost their lives and goods before in the nation's long history, but declared there are riches which "are not kept in strong boxes, but in the human heart."

Retain Their Faith

"These you have never lost," he said, "nor above all have the Polish people lost their faith . . .

"In their tempestuous life these people have known hours of discouragement, periods of seeming death, but also they have seen days of revival and resurrection.

"Poland is faithful to the faith of Christ and for that reason we are sure that you will never give up the sentiments so solidly anchored in your souls," the Pope said.

He urged that "whatever may be the new circumstances, the duty of everybody is to preserve, not only in prayer, but also courageously in activities, since it is exactly in those hours in which Divine Providence seems to hide itself for an instant that it is fine and good to believe in it."

"In fact," he added, "it is through justice and charity that there may finally be restored that peace for which, in the midst of torment of souls, so anxiously rise cries of the people and for which from one end of the world to the other millions of sincere souls, among them those who do not profess the Catholic faith, raise their prayers to God, sole ruler of the souls of men."

Young Democrats In West Virginia Favor Third Term

Bluefield, W. Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—The State's Young Democrats today called for a Roosevelt third term while deploring "the acts of certain persons in West Virginia in flouting the rights guaranteed to labor."

A convention resolution, calling no names, was said privately to be directed at Gov. Holt, entangled with the C. I. O. United Mine Workers in a controversy over jobless pay benefits to miners.

"We sincerely regret and deplore," the resoultion said, "the undemocratic attitude and acts of certain persons in West Virginia in flouting the rights grauanteed to labor under our Federal laws, which action has formented discord, incited violence an doffended labor by continuing to unjustly criticize and abuse organized labor in public speaking."

The resolution referred to the "violation" of Federal laws as concerns collective bargaining.

Letters Reveal Premonition, Anger at War

Pole Says Good-by to Brother; Briton Curses Interruption of Career

Two letters from the war zone arrived in Washington yesterday, letters written from points 1,000 miles apart and expressing views of the war that had nothing in common with each other.

One was from Poland, a soldier's "good-bye" to his brother. The other was from the Irish Free State, a college boy's "how's things?" to his former roommate.

In one was written the calm acceptance of a terrible fate—"We Poles do not lose spirit and go with sincere readiness to battle." Fear was balanced by hope—"perhaps God will allow us to withstand the enemy which is falling upon our fatherland. Perhaps we may see each other in our lifetime."

It was received by Joseph Chmielewski, of 331 Eleventh street northeast. Mailed on August 28, it is the last word he has received from his brother.

The other expressed the cheery confidence and sense of humor of a young Englishman, just out of Cambridge University and studying for the British Diplomatic Service. He wrote it September 11, eight days after Great Britain declared war on Germany; he felt as though he had "been in an explosion;" he was baffled, but unafraid.

"Curse this war," he wrote. "I was all set to go to the continent when it all began; in fact, I almost had my bag packed and my ticket bought . . . All that is changed and the idea of my ever sitting for the Diplomatic Service exams seems ever further distant.

"As regards this war, it combines interest with annoyance . . . Annoyance takes the form of this interference with my career, and the small difficulties of a slight sugar shortage and proposed petrol (gasoline) rationing schemes.

". . . As for myself I'm waiting. Waiting for a commission in some wretched regiment . . . the whole thing is so ludicrous that it almost keeps me awake at nights. Do you remember at Cambridge how we used to try and think how best we could act in this world to prevent a war? The trouble was that it came too soon.

"There is a story of an Irishman who was asked whether he would rather be in an accident or an explosion. He said an accident, and when asked why, he replied, "Well, in an accident, there ye are, but in an explosion, where are ye?" I feel as though I had been in an explosion! It's damned hard to know what to do, and I rather hope that I get into the army soon."

"It's great to hear from you," he concluded, "and maybe we'll meet again some day—when this war is over. Keep well and in good cheer."

'Peace Is Ours' To Be Subject of Rev. P. B. Marshall

The fall schedule will be resumed at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church today, with the recently formed choir singing under direction of Charles Dana Beaschler. The Rev. Peter B. Marshall will preach at 11 a. m. on "Peace Is Ours." His 8 p. m. theme will be "Friend Judas."

The Bible school will meet at 9:30 a. m., and the young people's fellowship will hold a tea in the parish hall at 6 p. m., followed by group meetings at 6:45 p. m. With the Rev. Mr. Marshall in charge, the midweek services will be resumed this Thursday.

Covenant-First. Dr. Albert J. McCartney will speak on "The Christian in the Crisis" at 11 a. m., when the newly-organized choir will make its first appearance under the direction of Theodore C. Schaefer.

Sherwood. The winter schedule of 8:50 and 11 a. m. services will be resumed, with the Rev. Thomas Law Coyle preaching. At the 8 p. m. services, the Daughters of America will present an American flag to the church, and the Lookout class will present a Christian flag.

Chevy Chase. "Visioning the World" will be the Rev. J. Hillman Hollister's sermon subject at 11 a. m., when new members will be received and the Lord's Supper observed.

Northminster. The Rev. Walter E. Price will speak on "The Spiritual Bread," at 11 a. m. He will greet new members and lead Holy Communion rites.

Westminster Memorial. "The Cup of Sacrifice" will be the Rev. Harry V. Porter's 11 a. m. communion theme.

Gunton-Temple. With Dr. Bernard Braskamp in charge, Lord's Supper will be celebrated, and new members received.

Christian Science Lesson-Sermon To Be 'Unreality'

"Unreality" is the subject of the lesson-sermon in all the Churches of Christ, Scientist, today at 11 a. m. and 8 p. m. Sunday school is at 11 a. m. All are cordially invited to attend the church services including the Wednesday evening meetings at 8 o'clock.

The Golden Text is from Proverbs 13:7. "There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing: there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches."

Among the citations which comprise the lesson-sermon is the following from the Bible: "Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God." (I Corinthians 2:12).

The lesson-sermon also includes the following passage from the Christian Science textbook, "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures" by Mary Baker Eddy: "To divest thought of false trusts and material evidences in order that the spiritual facts of being may appear—this is the great attainment by means of which we shall sweep away the false and give place to the true."

546 Died in 1938 And 761 in 1037, Dr. Noble Reports

Pneumonia deaths in the District last year represented a 28 per cent decrease from 1937, Dr. John E. Noble, director of laboratories for the Health Department, reported yesterday. For six months of this year the rate has decreased 20 per cent from the same time in 1938.

Dr. Noble said pneumonia caused 546 deaths in 1938 and 761 in 1937. The disease ranked third in 1937 in major causes of death and last year, fifth.

The work of the men in the laboratory which is now functioning on a 24-hour schedule has been of great importance in lowering the number of deaths from pneumonia, he said.

"This lowered mortality is not just accidental," Dr. Noble asserted. "Two years ago there was organized in Washington, as in many other places in the country, a co-operative undertaking with a special committee of the District Medical Society to work out a pneumonia control program that would utilize the newer discovery which science has made available in combating these infections. A very important phase in this program is the service performed by the bacteriology laboratory."

Dr. Noble said at least 30 different types of organisms may produce pneumonia. For some of these organisms specific sera have been developed to aid in the recovery of the patient. It is therefore necessary for the physician to know what type of organism is responsible for the disease. This is the work of the laboratory, he said.

E. L. Edmonds Rites Tomorrow

Funeral services for E. Leo Edmonds, lay member of the Order of St. Francis, will be held at 10 a. m. tomorrow at St. Martin's Church.

A native of Washington, Mr. Edmonds was 38 when he died Friday night. He suffered a heart attack at his home, 125 U street northeast. He worked as a pressman for a number of Washington printing companies.

Burial will take place at Mount Olivet Cemetery. Surviving are his mother, Mrs. Anna Edmonds, of 125 U street northeast, and his brother, J. Bernard Edmonds, of Baltimore.

Reds Reported Seeking Naval Base in Latvia

Little Baltic Nation Can Hardly Withhold Consent, Says Account

By International News Service

Budapest, Sept. 30.—Russia was reported in Budapest tonight to be preparing a demand up Latvia for the use of strategic Libau (Liepaja) Bay as a Soviet naval base.

It is said Latvia is next in line for pressure from Moscow, now that Estonia has signed a pact, granting Russia the use of a port and two islands for naval and air stations.

Reports said Latvian officials might go to Moscow from Riga early next week at the invitation of the Soviet government. Commenting on this, the Budapest newspaper Azest said Latvia "would hardly be in a position to withhold consent" from a Russian demand for Libau, which is located just north of the Lithuanian coast and the Nazi harbor of Memel.

A foothold in the deep-water, ice-free bay of Libau would give the Soviets cmoplete command of the northern Baltic coast and greatly improve the mobility of the Soviet Baltic navy.

Finns Are Worried

Helsinki, Finland, Sept. 30.—The implications of the Soviet advance into Estonian territory in order to secure a strong foothold in the Baltic are now fully realized in Finland, Estonia's immediate neighbor in the North Baltic, and the prospect is estimated as being far from reassuring.

Recently the Baltic was regarded as an entirely German sphere of influence. After the Russo-German pact the Baltic was considered as controlled by Germany and Russia jointly. Now, however, it is admitted that at least the North Baltic has fallen completely under Soviet hegemony.

Political events have thus moved swiftly and have created a bewildering situation. Finnish newspapers, which during teh acute stages of the Estonan crisis observed the most careful reticence, apparently in order not to hurt Soviet susceptibilities, today are speaking more freely.

Dangers Increased

Obviously, the happenings in Estonia have brought distinctly increased dangers to Finland also, as the Soviet now controls the whole south side of the Gulf of Finland and is pushing fortifications closer to Finland's main outlet to the sea through the Baltic.

At the same time, it becomes clear that Germany has sacrificed practically every means at present to influence developments in the North Baltic and this is having far-reaching political and economic repercussions there. It is assumed also that vital Swedish interests are involved.

The clearest survey of the new Baltic situation was uttered today by Reinhold Svento, chairman of the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs, who considers that Estonia has not only lost her neutral status and the right to shape her foreign policy, but has become the Soviet's military ally. He holds that Russia's advance to the Baltic has changed Finland's, Latvia's and Sweden's relations to the Soviet.

Press Criticizes Finland

Estonian Foreign Minister Seliers left Moscow today for Riga, where he will communicate to the Latvian government the terms and implications of the so-called mutual assistance pact signed with the Soviet Union.

There have been articles in the Soviet press criticizing Finland's economic conditions and alleging mass unemployment. The Aaaland Islands, off Finland, also are mentioned today in the Soviet press.

The Latvians, like everyone else, can only construe the clause in the Estonian pact in which reference is made to defense against a great power attacking across Latvian territory, as reinsurance against the only great power capable of doing this—Germany.

The Estonian pact, it was announced today in Moscow, already has been ratified.

Jails Open on All Sides for Convict Held in District

Barney Niefield, 43, of Paterson, N. J., no sooner gets out of one jail than he lands in another. Indicted here in 1933, with several companions for the $9,000 holdup of a Washington Mechanics Savings Bank, he was located at Sing Sing, serving time for robbery.

He was released from Sing Sing several weeks ago but as soon as he stepped outside, he was taken into custody by local detectives. Returned here, he was arrained yesterday before District Court Justice Peyton Gordon. Assistant District Attorney Howard Boyd recommended $10,000 bail.

This sum was reduced to $7,500 by Justice Gordon, and Barney was about to enjoy freedom when Detective Sergt. Walter Beck arrived. He arrested the suspect on a detainer from Philadelphia, charging him with robbing a bank there of $37,000 in 1931. Niefield was sent back to jail.

New Landlord, Tenant Court Plan to Start

Procedure Simplified And Costs Reduced In Reform Program

Beginning tomorrow, the landlord and tenant branch of the District Court will operate under new rules designed to simplify procedure and reduce costs, it was announced yesterday by the Washington Housing Association. The reforms, closely following those carried out in the small claims branch of the court, were approved by the judges August 10 after a three-year campaign by the Washington Housing Association.

Tenants who could not afford to draw up writen statements of defense under the old rules, and hence were denied trial, now will be able to state their defense orally. The court will sit an hour a day to hear cases.

Filing costs are reduced from $1 to 85 cents, and the judges ade given discretion in charging costs under the new rules. A judge will be forbidden to change his decree on the basis of new evidence after the three-month term of court expires. All papers will be issued in simple language.

Judge Armond W. Scott will be the first judge to conduct the court under new regulations. He will sit during October.

Murphy Asserts U. S. Is Ready to Cope With Spies

Attorney General Murphy, in an address to the 36 graduates of the F. B. I. National Police Academy, yesterday declared that the United States has "never before been so well prepared" to deal with the activities of foreign agents and saboteurs. He declared anti-espionage facilities are now well developed and America would be well protected.

J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the F. B. I., told the graduates that there are "those within our midst who enoy the opportunities and liberties which American democracy guarantees them, and who openly preach its destruction."

"Once the termites gain access to a structure," Hoover said, "its doom is inevitable." If the activities of foreign agents are not checked, he said, "we can expect the horrors of a permanent blackout of everything which we have cherished."

ov. Lloyd Stark of Missouri warned the police experts that soapbox agitators, far from being harmless, are in reality "dangerous enemies of democracy who stand ready to serve their alien masters as spies and wreckers if called upon to do so."

James Madison Miller, 92-year-old Civil War veteran, died early yesterday at his home, 2540 Fourteenth street northwest. An assistant auditor in the Treasury Department for about 40 years, Mr. Miller retired about 15 years ago.

He was born in Springfield, Ohio. At 15, he aided in forming the Sixteenth Ohio Battery for service in the War Between the States. Six months before the close of the war, he was taken prisoner.

Services will be held at 1 p. m. tomorrow at the Chambers funeral home, 1400 Chapin street northwest. Burial will follow at Arlington Cemetery.

500 Rush to Pay Taxes, Miss Penalty

More than 500 persons yesterday stormed the office of the collector of taxes to escape penalties for late payments of real estate and tangible taxes and special assessments.

Together with collections by mail, Collector C. M. Towers counted up to $1,800,000 for the deadline day. Of this amount, $1,133,504 represented real estate taxes. Towers said payments in the mail postmarked September 30 would be accepted.

Roosevelt Asks Prices Be Watched

result of profiteering when there is a war in Europe.

As I see it, the TNEC is well qualified to invoke the forceful check of impartial public inquiry on this kind of un-American activity, and I was, therefore, much interested in your remarks on that subject at the TNEC hearings on September 25.

"All of us, of course, want to see producers, middlemen and retailers receive fair prices for what they sell, and all of us recognize that, in certain fields such fair prices are probably not as yet being received. But none of us wants to see the cost of living unjustifiably increased or prices become so unreasonably high as to interfere with our national defense.

"It seems to me, therefore, that during this period, the TNEC might well keep a constant eye on increases in our basic material and, in the light of past and present circumstances, study the facts to determine whether there is profiteering, or whether such increases are legitimate.

Special Study Planned

"I agree with you that such constant surveillance is clearly in keeping with the purposes and objectives for which the TNEC was established, and I believe that, in carrying forward such a program, your committee can well become an important part of our first line of national defense against ugly and inhuman greed."

In making public the President's letter, dated September 29, Chairman O'Mahoney said he would call the committee into special session to study methods of detecting artificial price increases.

"We are not concerned by the ordinary fluctuations of prices," O'Mahoney said, "but only in the exploitation of the consumer market."

He said Thurman Arnold, who represents the Department of Justice on the committee, had reported receiving weekly about 200 comcreases. The Justice Department, O'Mahoney added, did not have facilities to handle these complaints.

"There is, I am sure, no disposition anywhere to interfere with normal price reaction," O'Mahoney said. "It may be acknowledged, for example, that the prices received by agricultural producers are still generally below the profit level.

"There has also been in progress for several months past a most healthy recovery. That is welcomed by everyone. What the country is concerned about, is that there shall be no unwarranted and unjustified increases, or in one word, no profiteering."

Brown Opposes Revealing 'Fixes'

Police Chief Brown yesterday declared he did not favor the suggestion of Corporation Counsel Elwood Seal that the Police Department publish the names of persons who have traffic tickets "adjusted."

Seal revealed that 1,000 tickets had been taken care of by his court assistants since the first of the year. He added that approximately 3,000 tickets had been "fixed" during that period.

Seal explained there are some valid reasons for withdrawing a traffic ticket, but added that he would insist the names of all concerned be made public when a charge is dismissed.

Chinaman Struck By Streetcar Feared Near Death

Tamajiro Marumoto, 55, a Japanese of Honolulu staying at 2818 Hillary place northeast was in "fair" condition at Emergency Hospital last night after being struck by a street car. Several other persons were injured in traffic accidents.

The trolley victim, about 50 years old, was struck at Connecticut avenue and S street northwest, by a car reported to have been operated by Edwin C. Coppage, 26, of 644 Massachusetts avenue northwest. Physicians said the man suffered cuts and bruises and possibly a fractured skull. He was unconscious.

Five-year-old James Manion, 2214 Nicholson street southeast, was treated by a private doctor after he was knocked down by an automobile in front of his home. He received minor cuts on his head.

Robert Sloan, 25, of 1748 Columbia road northwest, and Louis Redmond, 18, of 51 Todd place northeast, were taken to Casualty Hospital early yesterday after their automobile crashed into a telephone pole on the Marlboro Pike near Hillside, Md.

Sloan, who was driving the machine, escaped with cuts. Redmond received hip and knee injuries.

Delegates Named To Tax Meeting

The Commissioners yesterday named local delegates to the thirty-second annual conference of the National Tax Association to be held in San Francisco during the week of October 16.

MR. AND MRS. EDWARD CURTIS ANDERSON

Mrs. Anderson Won't Guess How Many Of Apple Variety She Has Baked Over 50 Years; 20-Pound Cake on Hand

Mrs. Edward Curtis Anderson, looking forward to her golden wedding anniversary today, was at a loss yesterday to prescribe a sure-fire formula for a half century of wedding bliss. Unless—well, being a good pie baker does no harm.

With becoming modesty, Mrs. Anderson did not claim to be a good pie baker but the gleam that came into her husband's eye when the subject was mentioned testified that she was—and still is.

"But you wouldn't dare print the number of pies I used to make for him when we were first married," his wife said with a grin.

The couple will be the center of attraction this afternoon at a reception in their home, 600 Nicholson street northwest, where they live with a daughter Mrs. L. H. Middlekauff. Their other child, Mrs. Velma Davis, of Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y., three grandchildren and two great grandchildren also will be there.

Mr. and Mrs. Anderson have lived in Washington 43 years. In 1937 he was retired from the Bureau of Internal Revenue after 41 years of Government service.

Today they will cut a 20-pound wedding cake and Mrs. Anderson will receive the first wedding ring she has ever had. At the presentation ceremony, the Rev. Henry W. Snyder, pastor of St.Paul's English Lutheran Church, will give a talk.

this war, from which all of our efforts so persistently and ardently, but nevertheless futilely, sought to preserve from Europe."

He appealed to the bishops and clergy to continue their work in Poland and said he hoped for the preservation of liberty of worship, the Catholic press, charitable institutions, social work and religious instruction.

Polish Cardinal Present

August Cardinal Hlond, Primate of Poland, stood beside the Pope as he bestowed his apostolic blessing on the Polish people.

Many of those in the audience, mostly nuns and priests, wept at the Pope's words.

When he finished speaking, the Pope stepped down from his dais and stood in rapt attention as the gathering sang "May God Protect Poland," the hymn with which the Poles have comforted themselves in previous partitions of their homeland by foreign powers.

The Pope spoke of the Poles' military valor, their ten centuries of "defending Christian Europe" and their great religious faith.

He added that the Polish people had lost their lives and goods before in the nation's long history, but declared there are riches which "are not kept in strong boxes, but in the human heart."

Retain Their Faith

"These you have never lost," he said, "nor above all have the Polish people lost their faith . . .

"In their tempestuous life these people have known hours of discouragement, periods of seeming death, but also they have seen days of revival and resurrection.

"Poland is faithful to the faith of Christ and for that reason we are sure that you will never give up the sentiments so solidly anchored in your souls," the Pope said.

He urged that "whatever may be the new circumstances, the duty of everybody is to preserve, not only in prayer, but also courageously in activities, since it is exactly in those hours in which Divine Providence seems to hide itself for an instant that it is fine and good to believe in it."

"In fact," he added, "it is through justice and charity that there may finally be restored that peace for which, in the midst of torment of souls, so anxiously rise cries of the people and for which from one end of the world to the other millions of sincere souls, among them those who do not profess the Catholic faith, raise their prayers to God, sole ruler of the souls of men."

The fall schedule will be resumed at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church today, with the recently formed choir singing under direction of Charles Dana Beaschler. The Rev. Peter B. Marshall will preach at 11 a. m. on "Peace Is Ours." His 8 p. m. theme will be "Friend Judas."

The Bible school will meet at 9:30 a. m., and the young people's fellowship will hold a tea in the parish hall at 6 p. m., followed by group meetings at 6:45 p. m. With the Rev. Mr. Marshall in charge, the midweek services will be resumed this Thursday.

Covenant-First. Dr. Albert J. McCartney will speak on "The Christian in the Crisis" at 11 a. m., when the newly-organized choir will make its first appearance under the direction of Theodore C. Schaefer.

Sherwood. The winter schedule of 8:50 and 11 a. m. services will be resumed, with the Rev. Thomas Law Coyle preaching. At the 8 p. m. services, the Daughters of America will present an American flag to the church, and the Lookout class will present a Christian flag.

Chevy Chase. "Visioning the World" will be the Rev. J. Hillman Hollister's sermon subject at 11 a. m., when new members will be received and the Lord's Supper observed.

Northminster. The Rev. Walter E. Price will speak on "The Spiritual Bread," at 11 a. m. He will greet new members and lead Holy Communion rites.

Westminster Memorial. "The Cup of Sacrifice" will be the Rev. Harry V. Porter's 11 a. m. communion theme.

Gunton-Temple. With Dr. Bernard Braskamp in charge, Lord's Supper will be celebrated, and new members received.

Young Democrats In West Virginia Favor Third Term

Bluefield, W. Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—The State's Young Democrats today called for a Roosevelt third term while deploring "the acts of certain persons in West Virginia in flouting the rights guaranteed to labor."

A convention resolution, calling no names, was said privately to be directed at Gov. Holt, entangled with the C. I. O. United Mine Workers in a controversy over jobless pay benefits to miners.

"We sincerely regret and deplore," the resoultion said, "the undemocratic attitude and acts of certain persons in West Virginia in flouting the rights grauanteed to labor under our Federal laws, which action has formented discord, incited violence an doffended labor by continuing to unjustly criticize and abuse organized labor in public speaking."

The resolution referred to the "violation" of Federal laws as concerns collective bargaining.

Letters Reveal Premonition, Anger at War

Pole Says Good-by to Brother; Briton Curses Interruption of Career

Two letters from the war zone arrived in Washington yesterday, letters written from points 1,000 miles apart and expressing views of the war that had nothing in common with each other.

One was from Poland, a soldier's "good-bye" to his brother. The other was from the Irish Free State, a college boy's "how's things?" to his former roommate.

In one was written the calm acceptance of a terrible fate—"We Poles do not lose spirit and go with sincere readiness to battle." Fear was balanced by hope—"perhaps God will allow us to withstand the enemy which is falling upon our fatherland. Perhaps we may see each other in our lifetime."

It was received by Joseph Chmielewski, of 331 Eleventh street northeast. Mailed on August 28, it is the last word he has received from his brother.

The other expressed the cheery confidence and sense of humor of a young Englishman, just out of Cambridge University and studying for the British Diplomatic Service. He wrote it September 11, eight days after Great Britain declared war on Germany; he felt as though he had "been in an explosion;" he was baffled, but unafraid.

"Curse this war," he wrote. "I was all set to go to the continent when it all began; in fact, I almost had my bag packed and my ticket bought . . . All that is changed and the idea of my ever sitting for the Diplomatic Service exams seems ever further distant.

"As regards this war, it combines interest with annoyance . . . Annoyance takes the form of this interference with my career, and the small difficulties of a slight sugar shortage and proposed petrol (gasoline) rationing schemes.

". . . As for myself I'm waiting. Waiting for a commission in some wretched regiment . . . the whole thing is so ludicrous that it almost keeps me awake at nights. Do you remember at Cambridge how we used to try and think how best we could act in this world to prevent a war? The trouble was that it came too soon.

"There is a story of an Irishman who was asked whether he would rather be in an accident or an explosion. He said an accident, and when asked why, he replied, "Well, in an accident, there ye are, but in an explosion, where are ye?' I feel as though I had been in an explosion! It's damned hard to know what to do, and I rather hope that I get into the army soon."

"It's great to hear from you," he concluded, "and maybe we'll meet again some day—when this war is over. Keep well and in good cheer."

Christian Science Lesson-Sermon To Be 'Unreality'

"Unreality" is the subject of the lesson-sermon in all the Churches of Christ, Scientist, today at 11 a. m. and 8 p. m. Sunday school is at 11 a. m. All are cordially invited to attend the church services including the Wednesday evening meetings at 8 o'clock.

The Golden Text is from Proverbs 13:7. "There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing: there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches."

Among the citations which comprise the lesson-sermon is the following from the Bible: "Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God." (I Corinthians 2:12).

The lesson-sermon also includes the following passage from the Christian Science textbook, "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures" by Mary Baker Eddy: "To divest thought of false trusts and material evidences in order that the spiritual facts of being may appear—this is the great attainment by means of which we shall sweep away the false and give place to the true."

546 Died in 1938 And 761 in 1037, Dr. Noble Reports

Pneumonia deaths in the District last year represented a 28 per cent decrease from 1937, Dr. John E. Noble, director of laboratories for the Health Department, reported yesterday. For six months of this year the rate has decreased 20 per cent from the same time in 1938.

Dr. Noble said pneumonia caused 546 deaths in 1938 and 761 in 1937. The disease ranked third in 1937 in major causes of death and last year, fifth.

The work of the men in the laboratory which is now functioning on a 24-hour schedule has been of great importance in lowering the number of deaths from pneumonia, he said.

"This lowered mortality is not just accidental," Dr. Noble asserted. "Two years ago there was organized in Washington, as in many other places in the country, a co-operative undertaking with a special committee of the District Medical Society to work out a pneumonia control program that would utilize the newer discovery which science has made available in combating these infections. A very important phase in this program is the service performed by the bacteriology laboratory."

Dr. Noble said at least 30 different types of organisms may produce pneumonia. For some of these organisms specific sera have been developed to aid in the recovery of the patient. It is therefore necessary for the physician to know what type of organism is responsible for the disease. This is the work of the laboratory, he said.

Reds Reported Seeking Naval Base in Latvia

Little Baltic Nation Can Hardly Withhold Consent, Says Account

By International News Service

Budapest, Sept. 30.—Russia was reported in Budapest tonight to be preparing a demand up Latvia for the use of strategic Libau (Liepaja) Bay as a Soviet naval base.

It is said Latvia is next in line for pressure from Moscow, now that Estonia has signed a pact, granting Russia the use of a port and two islands for naval and air stations.

Reports said Latvian officials might go to Moscow from Riga early next week at the invitation of the Soviet government. Commenting on this, the Budapest newspaper Azest said Latvia "would hardly be in a position to withhold consent" from a Russian demand for Libau, which is located just north of the Lithuanian coast and the Nazi harbor of Memel.

A foothold in the deep-water, ice-free bay of Libau would give the Soviets cmoplete command of the northern Baltic coast and greatly improve the mobility of the Soviet Baltic navy.

Finns Are Worried

Helsinki, Finland, Sept. 30.—The implications of the Soviet advance into Estonian territory in order to secure a strong foothold in the Baltic are now fully realized in Finland, Estonia's immediate neighbor in the North Baltic, and the prospect is estimated as being far from reassuring.

Recently the Baltic was regarded as an entirely German sphere of influence. After the Russo-German pact the Baltic was considered as controlled by Germany and Russia jointly. Now, however, it is admitted that at least the North Baltic has fallen completely under Soviet hegemony.

Political events have thus moved swiftly and have created a bewildering situation. Finnish newspaprs, which during teh acute stages of the Estonan crisis observed the most careful reticence, apparently in order not to hurt Soviet susceptibilities, today are speaking more freely.

Dangers Increased

Obviously, the happenings in Estonia have brought distinctly increased dangers to Finland also, as the Soviet now controls the whole south side of the Gulf of Finland and is pushing fortifications closer to Finland's main outlet to the sea through the Baltic.

At the same time, it becomes clear that Germany has sacrificed practically every means at present to influence developments in the North Baltic and this is having far-reaching political and economic repercussions there. It is assumed also that vital Swedish interests are involved.

The clearest survey of the new Baltic situation was uttered today by Reinhold Svento, chairman of the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs, who considers that Estonia has not only lost her neutral status and the right to shape her foreign policy, but has become the Soviet's military ally. He holds that Russia's advance to the Baltic has changed Finland's, Latvia's and Sweden's relations to the Soviet.

Press Criticizes Finland

Estonian Foreign Minister Selters left Moscow today for Riga, where he will communicate to the Latvian government the terms and implications of the so-called mutual assistance pact signed with the Soviet Union.

There have been articles in the Soviet press criticizing Finland's economic conditions and alleging mass unemployment. The Aaaland Islands, off Finland, also are mentioned today in the Soviet press.

The Latvians, like everyone else, can only construe the clause in the Estonian pact in which reference is made to defense against a great power attacking across Latvian territory, as reinsurance against the only great power capable of doing this—Germany.

The Estonian pact, it was announced today in Moscow, already has been ratified.

Jails Open on All Sides for Convict Held in District

Barney Niefield, 43, of Paterson, N. J., no sooner gets out of one jail than he lands in another. Indicted here in 1933, with several companions for the $9,000 holdup of a Washington Mechanics Savings Bank, he was located at Sing Sing, serving time for robbery.

He was released from Sing Sing several weeks ago but as soon as he stepped outside, he was taken into custody by local detectives. Returned here, he was arrained yesterday before District Court Justice Peyton Gordon. Assistant District Attorney Howard Boyd recommended $10,000 bail.

This sum was reduced to $7,500 by Justice Gordon, and Barney was about to enjoy freedom when Detective Sergt. Walter Beck arrived. He arrested the suspect on a detainer from Philadelphia, charging him with robbing a bank there of $37,000 in 1931. Niefield was sent back to jail.

New Landlord, Tenant Court Plan to Start

Procedure Simplified And Costs Reduced In Reform Program

Beginning tomorrow, the landlord and tenant branch of the District Court will operate under new rules designed to simplify procedure and reduce costs, it was announced yesterday by the Washington Housing Association. The reforms, closely following those carried out in the small claims branch of the court, were approved by the judges August 10 after a three-year campaign by the Washington Housing Association.

Tenants who could not afford to draw up writen statements of defense under the old rules, and hence were denied trial, now will be able to state their defense orally. The court will sit an hour a day to hear cases.

Filing costs are reduced from $1 to 85 cents, and the judges ade given discretion in charging costs under the new rules. A judge will be forbidden to change his decree on the basis of new evidence after the three-month term of court expires. All papers will be issued in simple language.

Judge Armond W. Scott will he the first judge to conduct the court under new regulations. He will sit during October.

Murphy Asserts U. S. Is Ready to Cope With Spies

Attorney General Murphy, in an address to the 36 graduates of the F. B. I. National Police Academy, yesterday declared that the United States has "never before been so well prepared" to deal with the activities of foreign agents and saboteurs. He declared anti-espionage facilities are now well developed and America would be well protected.

J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the F. B. I., told the graduates that there are "those within our midst who enoy the opportunities and liberties which American democracy guarantees them, and who openly preach its destruction."

"Once the termites gain access to a structure," Hoover said, "its doom is inevitable." If the activities of foreign agents are not checked, he said, "we can expect the horrors of a permanent blackout of everything which we have cherished."

ov. Lloyd Stark of Missouri warned the police experts that soapbox agitators, far from being harmless, are in reality "dangerous enemies of democracy who stand ready to serve their alien masters as spies and wreckers if called upon to do so."

James Madison Miller, 92-year-old Civil War veteran, died early yesterday at his home, 2540 Fourteenth street northwest. An assistant auditor in the Treasury Department for about 40 years, Mr. Miller retired about 15 years ago.

He was born in Springfield, Ohio. At 15, he aided in forming the Sixteenth Ohio Battery for service in the War Between the States. Six months before the close of the war, he was taken prisoner.

Services will be held at 1 p. m. tomorrow at the Chambers funeral home, 1400 Chapin street northwest. Burial will follow at Arlington Cemetery.

500 Rush to Pay Taxes, Miss Penalty

More than 500 persons yesterday stormed the office of the collector of taxes to escape penalties for late payments of real estate and tangible taxes and special assessments.

Together with collections by mail, Collector C. M. Towers counted up to $1,800,000 for the deadline day. Of this amount, $1,133,504 represented real estate taxes. Towers said payments in the mail postmarked September 30 would be accepted.

result of profiteering when there is a war in Europe.

As I see it, the TNEC is well qualified to invoke the forceful check of impartial public inquiry on this kind of un-American activity, and I was, therefore, much interested in your remarks on that subject at the TNEC hearings on September 25.

"All of us, of course, want to see producers, middlemen and retailers receive fair prices for what they sell, and all of us recognize that, in certain fields such fair prices are probably not as yet being received. But none of us wants to see the cost of living unjustifiably increased or prices become so unreasonably high as to interfere with our national defense.

"It seems to me, therefore, that during this period, the TNEC might well keep a constant eye on increases in our basic material and, in the light of past and present circumstances, study the facts to determine whether there is profiteering, or whether such increases are legitimate.

Special Study Planned

"I agree with you that such constant surveillance is clearly in keeping with the purposes and objectives for which the TNEC was established, and I believe that, in carrying forward such a program, your committee can well become an important part of our first line of national defense against ugly and inhuman greed."

In making public the President's letter, dated September 29, Chairman O'Mahoney said he would call the committee into special session to study methods of detecting artificial price increases.

"We are not concerned by the ordinary fluctuations of prices," O'Mahoney said, "but only in the exploitation of the consumer market."

He said Thurman Arnold, who represents the Department of Justice on the committee, had reported receiving weekly about 200 comcreases. The Justice Department, O'Mahoney added, did not have facilities to handle these complaints.

"There is, I am sure, no disposition anywhere to interfere with normal price reaction," O'Mahoney said. "It may be acknowledged, for example, that the prices received by agricultural producers are still generally below the profit level.

"There has also been in progress for several months past a most healthy recovery. That is welcomed by everyone. What the country is concerned about, is that there shall be no unwarranted and unjustified increases, or in one word, no profiteering."

Brown Opposes Revealing 'Fixes'

Police Chief Brown yesterday declared he did not favor the suggestion of Corporation Counsel Elwood Seal that the Police Department publish the names of persons who have traffic tickets "adjusted."

Seal revealed that 1,000 tickets had been taken care of by his court assistants since the first of the year. He added that approximately 3,000 tickets had been "fixed" during that period.

Seal explained there are some valid reasons for withdrawing a traffic ticket, but added that he would insist the names of all concerned be made public when a charge is dismissed.

Chinaman Struck By Streetcar Feared Near Death

Tamajiro Marumoto, 55, a Japanese of Honolulu staying at 2818 Hillary place northeast was in "fair" condition at Emergency Hospital last night after being struck by a street car. Several other persons were injured in traffic accidents.

The trolley victim, about 50 years old, was struck at Connecticut avenue and S street northwest, by a car reported to have been operated by Edwin C. Coppage, 26, of 644 Massachusetts avenue northwest. Physicians said the man suffered cuts and bruises and possibly a fractured skull. He was unconscious.

Five-year-old James Manion, 2214 Nicholson street southeast, was treated by a private doctor after he was knocked down by an automobile in front of his home. He received minor cuts on his head.

Robert Sloan, 25, of 1748 Columbia road northwest, and Louis Redmond, 18, of 51 Todd place northeast, were taken to Casualty Hospital early yesterday after their automobile crashed into a telephone pole on the Marlboro Pike near Hillside, Md.

Sloan, who was driving the machine, escaped with cuts. Redmond received hip and knee injuries.

Power Plant Opponents Map Arlington Fight

Committee Formed To Seek Defeat of County Referendum

ARLINGTON COUNTY BUREAU OF THE POST, Clarendon, Va. Tel OXford 0509.

Opponents of the proposed bond issue to acquire a county-operated electric power plant have formed a committee to seek defeat of the referendum which comes before the voters November 7.

The group, to be known as the "Committee Opposing Power Bond Issue" is headed by J. Byron Brooks and includes prominent business and professional men of the county. The committee announced it would inform citizens of the facts and figures underlying the project through personal contact, literature, and public meetings. A subcommittee was appointed to raise funds for the fight.

Meanwhile, the public utility committee of the Arlington County Civic Federation announced its "pleasure" that the County Chamber of Commerce has undertaken an investigation of the proposed county-owned power system. Following its own investigation, the federation unit approved as sound an engineering firm's report that the county would benefit by acquiring its own power facilities.

Brooks' committee includes Albert H. Cohen, Ashton C. Jones, sr., F. E. Westenberger, B. M. Smith, Ashton C. Jones, jr., Fred A. Gosnell, Thomas J. Crack, C.Harrison Mann, M. A. Mace, Henry S. Clay, jr., E. L. Usilton, Frank G. Campbell, George W. Scheuerman, Allen C. Adams, J. Thomas Manning, Harry W. Porter, L. C. Smith and J. Foster Hagan.

O'Conor Crowns Tobacco Queen

Queen Nicotina VI, Miss Kathryn Edelen, is crowned by Gov. Herbert R. O'Conor as the climax of the Charles County Fair at La Plata, Md.

Coronation, Ball Climax Charles Fair

Miss Edelen Crowned By Gov. O'Conor; Pageant Offered

By the Associated Press

La Plata, Md., Sept. 30.—Miss Katherine Edelen, wearing a long white gown and train, was crowned Queen Nicotine I today at the climax of the sixteenth annual Charles County Fair.

Gov. Herbert R. O'Conor placed a wreath of flowers on her head and draped over her shoulders a cloak of tobacco leaves. The State Senators from each of the four southern Maryland counties presented at the court a princess representing his county.

The Governor spoke briefly from beside the queen's throne on a platform in front of the fairground grandstand. Praising southern Maryland and its history, he called attention to the importance of tobacco growing to the State's economy.

The queen, the Governor and the princesses watched from a special stand a presentation of the pageant, "Tobacco Humoresque," showing the development of tobacco growing from colonial times.

The Governor was guest later at a dinner attended by approximately 50 county leaders and then went to the tobacco ball at the La Plata High School.

The fair, which opened Thursday, will close tomorrow after a horse show.

The setting of today's pageant was in England at the Court of James I and showed the difficulty the settlers had in introducing tobacco.

The "Court of the Magic Weed" was constituted as follows: The queen, Miss Edelen, a blonde of exceptional beauty and daughter of State's Attorney and Mrs. Edward J. Edelen, of Bryantown; Princess Anne Arundel, Miss Ethel Lee Williams, of Waterbury; Princess Calvert, Miss Margaret Plummer, of Huntington; Princess Prince Georges, Miss Dolly Sasscer, of Upper Marlboro, and Princess St. Marys, Miss Frances Hilton, of Parkhall, Md.

In the baby show this morning first prize in under-18-months class was awarded to Katherine Ophelia Hungerford, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Hungerford, of Bryans Road; 18 months to 3 year class, Charles Lester Winkler, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Winkler, of La Plata.

Montgomery Rural Housing Held Appalling

Survey Lays Ground For Project to Aid Low-Income Workers

Housing conditions among low-income rural laborers of Montgomery County were described yesterday by E. Brooke Lee, chairman of the Montgomery County Housing Authority, as "appallingly unlivable."

He announced that a preliminary survey of the eastern portion of the county has revealed that the average income of 140 families living in substandard houses is less than $450 annually.

"Such income certainly entitles these families to share in the benefits of the lowrent housing program of the U. S. Housing Authority," Lee declared. "Our local housing authority has applied for Federal assistance amounting to about $2,500,000 with which to eliminate Montgomerye County's worst housing."

To Seek Federal Aid

Families were interviewed by a group of young women conducting the survey in Mount Zion, Spencerville, Goodhope, Colesville, Emory Grove, Hollywood, Holland's Corner, Smithville, Sandy Spring, Olney, Brookville, Norbeck, Rockville, Ashton, Pine Hill, Burnt Mills, Brooks Grove, Brighton and White Oak.

Survey of other sections will be started Tuesday, Lee said. It is expected to be completed within ten day. When the survey is completed, it will be used as a basis for asking Federal money with which to construct new housing for such families.

"You can easily understand the very real need of these unfortunate families for decent housing," Lee said. "When the results of this survey finally are tabulated." He said that of the 14 families contacted only three had interior water systems in their homes and many did not even have water in their own yards. Sanitary conditions are nothing short of dangerous.

16 Communities Contemplated

"Unsocial and unsanitary crowding exists in all of the communities investigated," he said. "Everybody knows that hundreds of new homes have been built in this county in the past few years but not one brick has been laid for families of low income."

He declared that many laborers, steady workers and earning $18 or $20 a week, are unable to find places for their families and are resorting to renting or buying small plots of undesirable ground and building shacks of whatever materials they are able to scarpe together. These houses are worse than slums to begin with, Lee said, and cannot be heated properly nor are sanitary facilities available.

It will be possible with a loan from the U. S. Housing Authority to establish some 16 communities in which scattered families of laborers in the lowest income group may be brought closer together, Lee declared. Definite plans have not been completed but it is hoped to group the rehoused families in certain locations.

Would Cut School Costs

Such a plan not only would aid rural housing but also would be of value to taxpayers of the county because it would assist in consolidation of school districts and itegration of road and transportation systems.

"We have a good road system and an increasingly improved school system, with school busses available to carry children to their classrooms," Lee said. "Yet the children of many of our low-income families are unable to attend schools regularly because of their remoteness fro mroutes traveled by the buses.

"If these families were drawn closer together in public housing communities, much of their transportation problem would be solved and the school attendance from these families would be more regular and consequently more valuable to the families."

Dr. H. G. A. Brauer Retires After 22 Years in U. S. Post

Dr. Herman G. A. Brauer, of Arlington, Va., the first expert in tariff economics to be appointed by the United States Tariff Commission, retired yesterday after 22 years of Government service. He was presented with a wallet by Sidney Morgan, secretary of the commission, on behalf of his colleagues. Raymond B. Stevens, chairman, presided.

Dr. Brauer was employed by the Tariff Commission as a wool expert in May, 1917. After several years' work on commercial policies of foreign countries and their treaties with the United States, he published in 1922 a "Handbook of Commercial Treaties," which established a foundation on which subsequent studies of the subject have been based.

Before entering Government service, Dr. Brauer was engaged in educational work, municipal research and commerce. He holds degrees from Colorado College and the University of Wisconsin, and the University of Adelaide, Australia. He is a native of Australia.

Architect Dies While Visiting Greenbelt Homes

Arthur Remick, 50, New York architect, died suddenly of a heart attack yesterday as he was visiting Greenbelt with a group of members who attended sessions of the American Institute of Architects in Washington this past week.

Remick made his home in the Hotel Royalton, New York City. Police last night were unable to reach members of his family. The body was taken to the Gasch funeral home, Hyattsville, Md.

He was the second person attending the architects' meeting to succumb to a heart attack. Irving K. Pond, of Chicago, a past president of the organization, died Friday in Emergency Hospital.

Olney Grange Gives Pins to 5 Past Masters

Presentation to five living past masters of past masters' pins and a grange pin to Miss Elizabeth T. Stabler, who has been treasurer of the organization for more than 30 years, featured a "booster night" program at Sherwood High School, Sandy Spring, last night, of the Olney Grange, the oldest active grange in Maryland.

The past masters honored were Calvin Bready, Josiah W. Jones, R. Bentley Thomas, sr., Samuel P. Thomas and Robert H. Miller, jr. The presentations were made by Worthy Master Chester B. Graham.

The program also included an address by J. Oliver Martin, editor of "The Transmitter," who discussed fraterenities; music by memberes of the grange, a talk by Allen Farquhar, who joined the grange six months after its formation in 1873, and other features. Mr. Farquhar and Miss Cornelia Finneyfrock were introduced as the oldest and youngest member, repsectively. A history of the Olney group was given by Worthy Master Graham.

MarlboroCourt Denies Berman 54th Writ Plea

Judge Mattingly Bars Freedom to Murderer; Gov. O'Conor Testifies

Judge Joseph C. Mattingly yesterday denied the fifty-fourth plea of Louis Berman convicted of murder in Baltimore in 1928 for a writ of habeas corpus after a hearing in Circuit Court at Upper Marlboro, Md.

Gov. O'Conor of Maryland was among the prominent witnesses summoned by Berman but his only testimony was that he was the State's attorney who tried Berman. State's Attorney Bernard J. Wells of Baltimore rose and stipulated that the facts Gov. O'Conor was to testify to were correct.

Berman's contention is that he was denied his Constitutional rights when a jury which tried him failed to act on his plea of insanity first but instead followed the custom of more than a century and returned a verdict merely of guilty of murder with life imprisonment. A subsequent decision of the State Court of Appeals in another case ruled that the question of sanity must be disposed of first when a plea of insanity is entered.

Edward Gross, clerk of the Criminal Court of Baltimore City, produced a certified copy of the arraignment and State's Attorney Wells also testified. Judges Eugene O'Dunne and George A. Salters, of Baltimore failed to appear.

Berman was convicted September 24, 1928 in Baltimore Criminal Court of the murder of his attorney, Clifford F. Brown. He studied law while in the penitentiary and seized upon the decision of the Court of Appeals as a basis for his plea for a writ of habeas corpus. He has had a hearing before practically every judge in Maryland.

At the conclusion of the hearing, he told Attorney George Burroughs, assigned as counsel by Judge Mattingly, "I'll try again."

O'Conor Cites 'Appalling Toll' As Road Safety Drive Starts

By the Associated Press

Baltimore, Sept. 30.—Gov. Herbert R. O'Conor prefaced Maryland's most vigorous traffic safety drive in history tonight with a State-wide broadcast emphasizing the "appalling toll" of lives lost in automobile accidents.

During the 19 months Marylanders were engaged in the World War, he asserted, their loss was 645 soldiers; in the last 19 months automobile accident have killed 642 persons in the State.

"It is truly an alarming thought that here in our own peaceful State of Maryland, with our citizens going quietly about their business, approximately the same number of people were slaughtered in traffic accidents as were killed in action in the war," the Governor said.

"We must take that fact to heart if we are to deserve the name of reasoning human beings. It must be admitted our people have not given sufficient serious thought to this most alarming of present day problems."

Many Groups Aligned

State, city and county officials, aligned with civic and educational groups throughout the State, will open the safety campaign tomorrow.

Led by O'Conor and his new safety committee, the county-by-county and precinct-by-precinct drive will concentrate on reduction of accident deaths and injuries in October, November, and December—shown by statistics as the most "dangerous" months on the highways.

School superintendents, civic leaders and women's club executives will join State police, representatives of the motor vehicle commissioner's office, and the State roads commission in spreading the doctrine of accident prevention.

Daily radio programs will bring State department heads and other campaign leaders on the air.

Death Toll Increases

Last year, ov. O'Conor said, 466 person were killed and 10,000 others injured in automobile accidents in Maryland. This year, the death toll is running 35 per cent higher for the first nine months, with the "worst" months ahead.

"Save a life—perhaps your own" is the campaign slogan.

In high schools, safe driving courses will be emphasized. Department stores will display traffic safety windows. Safety lessons will be stressed in elementary schools.

Meanwhile, O'Conor issued a warning that drunken drivers convicted of a second offense need expect no executive clemency.

He denied parole of Julius Ratas, serving six months for drunken driving in Washington County.

"Ratas was convicted of an identical offense in March, 1935," the Governor said, "and his fine of $100 was remitted. It does not appear that Ratas was sufficiently impressed with the necessity of remaining sober while handling such a potentially dangerous instrumentality as an automobile on the public highways."

E. S. Moores Dies; G. O. P. Ex-Official

Edward S. Moores, 71, former Government Printing Office and Procurement Division official, died yesterday at Emergency Hospital.

A native of Washington, Mr. Moores operated a newspaper at Lake Geneva, Wis., before joining the Government Printing Office, where he became purchasing agent, later serving as assistant chief of the Procurement Division, retiring in 1933 after 30 years' service.

A member of the Columbia Country Club, Mr. Moores was active among the Masonic lodges and was a member of Washington Centennial, Mount Vernon Chapter, Potomac Commandery, Albert Pike Consistory, Royal Order of Scotland and Almas Temple.

He leaves his wife, Mae Gerard Moores, and a niece, Mrs. George R. Bready, of Herndon, Va. Services will be held tomorrow ta 2 p. m. in the residence, 23 Everett street, Chevy Chase View, Md., with burial to follow in Glenwood Cemetery.

$150,000 Hospital Addition at U. of Va. Completed

The Neuro-Psychiatric addition to the University of Virginia Hospital has been completed and will be occupied Monday, according to Frank E. Hartman, superintendent of grounds and buildings. The building, joined to the preventorium wing of the hospital, cost $150,000, and was made possible by a gift of $87,500 from Paul Goodloe McIntire, and a grant of $62,500 from the PWA. The addition provides for 41 patients. Dr. David C. Wilson, associate professor of neurology and psychiatry, who will direct activities in the new addition; Dr. Harvey E. Jordan, dean of the department of medicine; Dr. Carlisle S. Lentz, superintendent of the University Hospital, and others, will be on hand this afternoon to assist in showing visitors through the new quarters

Hanrahan Heads Chest Committee

Frank C. Hanrahan, Arlington manager, yesterday was named chairman of the Committee of One Hundred to sponsor the Chest Campaign, which opens October 30. Appointment was made by Col. Christopher B. Garnett, county chairman. Hanrahan will choose the committee.

Charles T. Jesse, county treasurer, has been named as treasurer of the "Give Where You Live" campaign. Mrs. Laura T. Boldin has been appointed executive secretary. Vice chairmen include: Harry G. Green, commissioner of revenue; Fletcher Kemp, county school superintendent; Mrs. Louis C. Carl, Mrs. Ruby G. Simpson, and the Rev. Henry J. Miller.

Cherrydale Topics

W. H. B. Brown, pastor of Cherrydale Baptist Church, speaks today at 11 a. m. on "God's Provision in Christ for Joy in Suffering," and at 7:30 p. m. on "Normal Born-Again People Do Not Continue in Known Sin."

Fire Damages Rockville Store

Fire believed caused by an oil stove yesterday caused damage estimated at $5,000 to the two story brick building on Montgomery avenue, Rockville, Md., owned by Samuel Chmar. The Rockville Volunteer Fire Department battled with the flames for more than an hour, blocking traffic on Montgomery avenue, Rockville's main street. County police rerouted traffic through side streets.

Household effects of the residents of several apartments on the second floor were damaged by fire and water and stocks in the grocery store of B. G. Sanders and the dry goods store of Emanuel Sacks on the first floor were damaged by water.

Dr. Ellis' Theme

At the beginning of his eleventh year as pastor of First Baptist Church, Alexandria, Va., Dr. Pierce S. Ellis will preach today at 11 a. m. on "He Spake With Authority," and at 8 p. m. on "Some Imperative Recoveries."

British Army Pours Through France, Ready

English Troops Led By 14-18 Veterans, Know What to Do

By P. J. Philip
Copyright by New York Times.

British General Headquarters, Somewhere in France, Sept. 28 (delayed).—For two days the British army has been pouring into and across France. Where it comes from and where it is going are matters of no immediate concern; what matters is that it's here. So the first round goes to the English.

It is the axiom of military strategy that one should prevent the enemy, if possible, from reaching an objective from which they may deliver an attack. Germany has failed to prevent this first installment of the British army, with all its equipment and auxiliary services, from reaching France.

They call themselves "The Young Contemptibles"—these sons of the men of 1914 and after. They have that and hundreds of other slogans chalked on their supply wagons and trucks which they have baptized "Judith, Old Bob, Maggie, Edyth" and other names that strike their fancy.

"Any Time Now"

"Any Time Now" is another slogan for those who have reached France and it is usually followed by some advice to Hitler.

In the bright sunshine of this cold September weather, it all sounds and looks like pleasant excursion. We are still far from the reality of war. But there are other realities to occupy attention.

In little more than three weeks a force which in the old days would have been considered a very respectably large army, has been embarked, shipped, landed, transported and established in a foreign country with its supplies, guns, ammunition and medical stores along with equipment of every kind necessary to modern warfare, without the appearance of a hitch of any kind.

In little villages spread over a very wide area a small group of correspondents, privileged to get this first glimpse of what's in store, found complete units of the most famous regiments of the British army as comfortably housed and as well fed and as strictly in training as if they were on maneuvers at home—drilling, experimenting with new forms of attack and defense training with their weapons, perfecting themselves for their trial.

Trucks Fill Roads

Endless trains and trucks were on the roads, escorted by motorcyclists with military police at crossroads shepherding them along. For three hours a procession of trucks, with men and guns of all kinds, poured through the town. That was only one convoy. On other roads there were others. In villages 20 and 30 miles apart were little temporary training camps, for all this business of moving men, supplies is as synchronized as the movement of a clock.

On the staff work necessary for all this it isn't necessary to insist. Anyone who has ever had control of a picnic party or camp will understand.

In all this gigantic business there must always be a mixture of plan and improvisation. The plan was kept secret and is still being kept secret. None of the officers and men who form this complicated overseas force knew until within a few hours of sailing that they were to sail and didn't know until they arrived where would be the next stop.

The men in charge, from commander-in-chief to sergeant majors, are men who fought in France between 1913 and 1918 and they know what to do. In all this what may be called rule Number One is that there must be as little disturbance as possible to the local French population.

Brass Hats Efficient

These "brass hats" and their subordinates at headquarters, whom every man in the field in every army in the world always curses generously, have done their work with the efficiency of experienced men still young enough to invent new ways of doing things.

This isn't the old British army. It is an extremely efficient combination of both old and new with an incalculable capacity for growth and development. What is perhaps above all impressive is the provision for expansion.

In 1914 the British sent to France a small but good fighting force without anything behind it. This time they are doing things on a scale which indicates very emphatically that Prime Minister Chamberlain was not bluffing when he said that the war might last three years. In all ranks one finds a kind of fatalistic acceptance of that.

Louisiana Jury Indicts Leche And Four Others

Ruston, La., Sept. 30 (AP).—Former Gov. Richard W. Leche and four others were charged here today with operating a confidence game at the expense of the State.

The Lincoln Parish grand jury returned an indictment charging the quintet obtained $27,000 by false pretenses in the signing of a contract for Leche Hall, administration building at Louisiana Polytechnic Institute.

The New Orleans Federal grand jury two months ago charged Leche with conspiracy to violate the Connally "hot oil" act.

Indicted today with Leche, were Monte E. Hart, New Orleans contractor already under Federal sentence of two and one-half years for using the mails to defraud Louisiana State University of $75,000; and Leon C. Weiss, Julius Dreyfous and Solis Seiferth, all partners in an architectural firm.

Ruling by Manton Appealed Here

The Supreme Court was asked yesterday to decide whether the fact that Martin Manton, resigned judge of the Federal circuit court at New York, participated in deciding a case constituted grounds for reopening the case.

Manton was sentenced to serve two years in prison and fined $10,000 upon his conviction on a charge of selling justice. Abraham & Straus, Inc., of Brooklyn, sought the Supreme Court ruling in litigation involving cigarette lighter patents.

Marriage Licenses Up

With the exception of June, when 113 permits were issued, more marriage licenses were issued by the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court at Rockville, Md., during September than in any month since the 40-hour wait law went into effect last December. The September record was 100 licenses, or 24 more than the monthly average under the new law, Robert A. Hughes, license clerk, said.

Rx: Why Be a Doctor? Well, G. W. Students Want to Be!

Various Reasons Given by Group Starting Hard Course—but X-ray Examination Discloses They're Ready and Willing

By Gerald G. Gross

Why do you want to be a doctor?

Why chose a profession which pulls you out of bed in the middle of night, is one of the hardest and most expesive of all to prepare for and with recompense doubtful?

That question was among those put to some of the 75 young people, six of them girls, as they assembled for their first class at George Washington University medical school—raw, green, idealistic freshmen who hope to have "M. D." after their names four years hence.

One's Sister a Nurse

"My sister is a nurse," answered red-haired James F. Pruitt, who came up here from Oxford, N. C., to study medicine. "She's the one who gave me the idea and encouraged me to take it up."

Was he going to specialize?

"It's too early to say anything about that yet," he replied. "I've got a lot of learning to do first."

Miss Helen Frances Tefft, of Rochester, N. Y., said she's been interested in medicine "since I was so high," illustrating the "so high" with a hand about a foot above the floor.

One Chinese Student

Kenneth Chiang Sze, the only alien in the class, is the son of a physician. In fact, among the freshmen, one in every six is a doctor's son. None of the six girls is the daughter of an M. D. Anyway, the lone Chinese student has had medicine picked out for a career since he was a child in Shanghai.

Though he had only two years' college work at St. John's University in Shanghai and a semester's preparation at George Washington University, he succeeded in meeting the medical school's entrance requirements. And they are stiff. For every freshman chosen this fall, nine applicants were rejected.

Fond of Science

Richard Henry Fischer, one of the 27 Washington youths in the first year class, liked scientific subjects so much in high school and college he decided to become a doctor. He lives at 1724 Varnum street northwest.

One of the matriculants, John Paul Docktor, of Ellsworth, Pa., will be taking a lot of joshing from classmates and professors. Upperclassmen will blink when they hear a callow frosh addressed as "Docktor."

The new class is a melting pot of farm boys, small town boys, city boys. Rather oddly, all six girls are from big cities. Three are Washingtonians.

Come From Everywhere

From Mink Creek, Idaho, and Seattle, Wash., Brooklyn, N. Y., and Valparaiso, Ind., West Haven, Conn., and Puerto Rico, they've come to G. W. to be dosed up on gross anatomy, histology, embryology, pharmacology, psychiatry, ophthalmology, neurology, surgery and everything else it takes to qualify for a medical shingle.

"At the present moment there are many distractions," Dean W. A. Bloedorn told them, "the war in Europe, the special session of Congress and the close struggle in the National League. However, I can assure you that the faculty will do their best to occupy your time."

Va. Business Women To Join Observance

Richmond, Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—Business and professional women's clubs throughout Virginia will join in the twelfth observance of National Business Women's Week, October 8-14. The theme of this year's observance will be "100 Years of Women's Progress."

The executive board of the Virginia Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs will hold its fall meeting in Richmond, October 21-22. Speakers will include Mrs. Ellen S. Woodward, of the Social Security Board, Washington, whose subject will be "Business Women in a Democracy."

Farmers Advised To Produce More For Home Use

Blacksburg, Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—Greater emphasis upon production for home use is the best method whereby the farm share cropper may attain a higher standard of living, State and Federal rural sociologists have concluded from a recent Virginia survey.

They found that among 1,730 farm families studied in six counties, cropper families furnished 52 per cent of all the goods and services they consumed in family living, and owners and renters furnished only 42 and 45 per cent, respectively.

Sample counties in which white families were studied were Culpeper, Halifax, Nansemond, Prince Edward, Rockbridge and Wythe. Towns used in the same studies were Culpeper, Wytheville, Lexington, Farmville, Suffolk and South Boston.

Farm families produced on the average 44 per cent of what they needed for living, and town families only 14 per cent. The latter was made up of produce from kitchen gardens and from "housing furnished" by home owning families.

Railing Gives Way, Salesman Injured

Hagerstown, Md., Sept. 30.—Ernest Irvin, 27, Paintville, Ky., bottling company salesman is in the Washington County hospital with a fractured skull and other serious injuries, the result of a fall. Irvin was leaning aganist a railing in front of a local hotel last night, lost his balance and fell 10 feet to the entrance to a barber shop.

Study Planned Of Unamerican Activities in State

Richmond, Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—The executive committee of the Young Democratic Clubs of Virginia adopted a resolution today instructing John T. Duval to name a committee to study un-American activities in the State.

The motion was presented by John A. K. Donovan, chairman of the Eighth District, and Miss Nancy Lynn, college secretary, of Manassas.

The committee also authorized a committee to study the age limit question and to report on what would be a proper limitation.

John Currie, executive secretary, was voted an increase in salary and given a contract which will run until January 1, 1942.

NYA Head Speaks At Stone-Laying of $50,000 Project

By the Associated Press

Lonaconing, Md., Sept. 30.—The cornerstone for the $50,000 community house, a National Youth Administration project said to be the largest in the East, was laid here this afternoon between downpours of rain. Thunderstorms forced part of the exercises into a theater.

Aubrey W. Williams, national administrator of the N. Y. A., made the principal address. Williams said the community house will be for the use of underprivileged girls from Allegany and Garrett counties in learning trades and crafts.

The building is being constructed from native stone by 300 boys enrolled in the National Youth Administration.

Shenandoah Life to Name New Chairman

Post Created to Meet Recommendation of State Agency

By the Associated Press

Richmond, Va., Sept. 30.—Commissioner of Insurance George A. Bowles announced today the board of directors of the Shenandoah Life Insurance Company had adopted measures providing for reorganization of the company management as suggested by Bowles in a report to the State corporation commission.

The main action taken by the directors was the creation of the position of chairman of the board of directors and of the finance committee. A committee was appointed to select a man for this new office. Commissioner Bowles said the action "meets with the complete approval" of the State insurance department.

Upon notification today from Roanoke of the directors' action Bowles said in part:

No Reflection Intended

"The criticisms of certain practices of the Shennandoah Life Insurance Co. and its management, which have recently received such unfortunate publicity, were not intended in any way to reflect upon the high character and standing, personal integrity or honesty of purpose of President E. Lee Trinkle, or Executive Vice President J. P. Saul, jr., or any other individual officer of the Shennandoah Life Insurance Co.

"The recent examination of the financial condition of the Shenandoah life, conducted by the insurance departments of Virginia, Tennessee and the District of Columbia, proved it to be in splendid financial condition, as we have publicly stated before."

The State corporation commission a week ago, in making public a new examination of the Shenandoah Life, revealed that Bowles had recommended a "complete reorganization" of the management of the company as a result of what he termed "flagrant and inexcusable irregularities and violations of law as well as sound insurance business practices generally . . ."

D. C. Board Concurs

The Tennessee and District of Columbia Commissioners, who with Bowles supervised the examination, concurred in the general recommendation.

Bowles specifically suggested creation of the position of vice president and general manager, with a "thoroughly experienced and competent life insurance man" to be obtained for the position. He further suggested that this officer be given sufficient powers to "direct the fiscal and business affairs and policies of the company" and that he be paid by making a "proper reduction" in the salaries of President Trinkle, Executive Vice President Saul and the medical director, Dr. J. H. Dunkley, which were listed as $20,000, $15,000 and $13,000 per year, respectively, so that there would be no increase in the expense of the company for salaries.

Roll Out the Barrel for Lunch

When it's meal time for "Chicoutimi," the little bruin prefers a barrel but not for drinking purposes—except in a roundabout way. This is a typical luncheon scene at the Memphis, Tenn., home of Mr. and Mrs. John Sneed Williams, jr., with Cecil Williams, 10, holding bottle. Cecil's father brought the pet back from a Canadian hunting trip

J. A. Dickson Is Dead at 56; Ex-Professor

Taught Chemistry At Gettysburg for Two Decades

Special Dispatch to The Post

Gettysburg, Pa., Sept. 30.—J. Allen Dickson, for 21 years a professor of chemistry at Gettysburg College and a former member of the Gettysburg borough council, died yesterday at his home near Orrtanna at the age of 56. He had served as a member of the college faculty from 1906 to 1927 after graduating there in 1905.

He was an elder in the Gettysburg Presbyterian Church and was a Mason. He had served on the Gettysburg board of health. A younger brother, Mr. J. McCrea Dickson, head surgeon at the Warner Hospital here for 17 years, died two weeks ago.

Surviving are the widow, two sons, a brother and a sister. The funeral will be held in Gettysburg Monday afternoon.

Decision Delayed On Carroll's Right To Maintain Roads

Westminster, Md., Sept. 30 (AP).—Chief Judge F. Neal Parke withheld an immediate decision today on a mandamus suit seeking to establish the right of Carroll County to maintain its own roads.

Judge Parke directed both sides to file briefs and said he would hand down an opinion later after hearing arguments yesterday in the suit brought by the county commissioners against the State roads commission.

Carroll is one of eight counties in the State whose roads are maintained by the State from its share of the gasoline tax. The roads commission has refused to recognize the county's right to maintain its own road system.

Frederick Plan To Work Felons Gets Results

Weeds Cut, Streets Swept as Inmates 'Pay' for Keep

Frederick, Md., Sept. 30.—They're literally weeding out lawbreakers and the city is getting three-fold results from its prison work plan.

Not long ago the city decided to put ordinance violators to work at cutting weeds and other tasks to pay their "board" at the Frederick County Jail.

For a week or so now groups of prisoners under the guard of an officer have been swinging scythes, mowing down weeds in the northern section of the city.

"It's really helping," Police Chief Allen Bartgis said. "We are not getting as many drunks as we did before. Frederick's chronic drunks are afraid of work.

"Working prisoners has broken up the practice of making the jail a winter headquarters."

A check of the docket at police headquarters showed few local persons had been arrested since the work plan went into effect—and Chief Bartgis is determined to keep the docket as clear as possible.

"We're going to cut the weeds on every vacant lot," he asserted. "And when the weeds are gone, we'll have the men sweep the streets; and before all the streets are cleaned, there'll be some snow for them to shovel."

In other words, there's a year 'round job awaiting anyone so unfortunate as to get a term that long.

6.61% Increase Reported in Va. Road Traffic

Sharpest Gain Noted In Semitrailer Use During Year

By the Associated Press

Richmond, Va., Sept. 30.—Traffic on Virginia primary highways increased 6.61 per cent during the year ending June 30 as compared with the previous year, it was shown in a traffic study report released today by State highway officials.

Travel on the primary system was placed at 2,678,000,000 vehicle miles, an increase of 168,000,000 miles over the previous year. Gasoline consumption increased 6.55 per cent, which indicated, the report said, that travel on the primary system was either increasing at a slightly more rapid rate than travel on other roads and streets or that vehicles are getting slightly more mileage per gallon of gas.

Local passenger car traffic increased more rapidly than out-of-State traffic, the former showing an increase of 6 per cent, the latter 5.80 per cent, the report said. This was a pick-up in the increase of out-of-State traffic as compared with the increase of 1938 over 1937, which was only 2.4 per cent.

The report termed of the "greatest possible significance from the standpoint of highway design" the "almost unbelievable increase" in the usage of the tractor-semitrailer type of vehicle. These vehicles, although constituting only 4.62 per cent of the total traffic, traveled 123,700,000 miles last year against 75,700,000 the year before, an increase of 63.2 per cent. In contrast, the use of the single unit trucks showed an increase of less than one per cent.

The report pointed out that traffic did not increase uniformly over the entire State, and that some highways showed decreases.

Traffic on Route 3 from Fredericksburg southeast decreased almost eight per cent, whereas the parallel Route 17 increased 23 per cent.

Where Writers Meet

When director Norman Z. McLeod and writer Corey Ford are in New York, they always meet at the Colony Club, where a special table is reserved for them. It was there over a cup of coffee that they outlined the ida for their original screen story, "Remember," starring Robert Taylor and Greer Garson.

Pal Starts Blaze So Fireman Can Enjoy a Drive

Special Dispatch to The Post

Hagerstown, Md., Sept. 30.—James Waugh, 21, simply loved to drive a fire truck. He has been the driver for the Funkstown Volunteer Fire Department for a year, but in a small town there were few fires and little driving.

So he arranged with Carl Preston Miller, 19, of Beaver Creek, to set fire to a strawstack on the farm of John E. Harbaugh, near Funkstown, so that he could drive the fire truck to the scene.

Waugh and Miller both confessed early today, according to County Investigator W. A. Sellman, who has been investigating for several weeks an epidemic of strawstack fires in the Funkstown area.

Applemen Oppose FSCC Program In Adams County

Special Dispatch to The Post

Gettysburg, Pa., Sept. 30.—By unanimous vote at a special meeting in Biglerville, Adams County apple growers who are beginning the harvest of a million and a half bushels of apples, voted against apple purchases by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation. Copies of their resolution will be sent to Washington, Harrisburg and fruitgrowers of nearby counties.

President H. M. Weigle said the growers believed Government buying at a figure below cost of production "pegged" the price in buying here other years. They contend Government buying prevents a free market, he stated. "They want the Government to stay out of the apple business," he reported.

Regional Parley Of Red Cross Set Friday in Luray

Va. Poultrymen To Meet, Vie At Egg Show

Two-Day Session to Open Tuesday at Fredericksburg

By the Associated Press

Fredericksburg, Va., Sept. 30.—Charles W. Wampler, of Harrisonburg, Va., president of the Virginia State Poultry Federation, and S. J. Marsden, of the National Research Center, United States Department of Agriculture, will be among the speakers at the annual joint meeting of the Federation and the Southern States Marketing Co-operative here Tuesday and Wednesday.

Wampler will discuss "the future of the small turkey flock" and Marsden's topic will be "feeding and managing the farm turkey flock."

A highlight of the two-day meeting will be the annual egg show expected to draw entries from poultrymen throughout Virginia. A. L. Dean, poultry husbandman of Virginia Tech, is chairman of the show.

W. G. Wysor, Richmond, manager of the Southern States Co-operative, will speak at the afternoon session Tuesday on "the development of the Southern States Marketing Co-operative."

Members of the Future Farmers of America, organization of farm boys, and 4-H Club boys and girls have been invited to attend the meeting.

A number of exhibits dealing with the feeding and care of poultry will be shown in the conference building, Mrs. Robert Van Valzah, exhibit chairman, announced.

Loundoun Group Forms Council to Promote Health

Special Dispatch to The Post

Leesburg, Va., Sept. 30.—To unite the charitable, welfare and civic organizations of Loudoun County and its citizens into a co-operative movement to improve the health and general welfare of the county, an organization meeting of the Loudoun County Council was held yesterday afternoon at the hame of Mrs. W. C. Eustis at Otalands. Thirty-five people, including the heads of the various organizations and the mayors of the towns, were present.

Following the explanation of the purpose of the meeting by Mrs. Eustis and the reading of the constitution and by-laws by Mrs. Henry Fairfax, the following officers were elected; D. C. Sands, president; J. Stewart Smith, first vice president; B. Powell Harrison, second vice president, and Mrs. T. Frank Osburn, secretary.

Other members of the executive committee include the regional directors, H. I. Tiffany, Leesburg; Mrs. H. W. Beatty, Lovettsville; Miss Florence Manning, Jefferson; Mrs. W. T. Smith, Mount Gilead; Miss Charlotte H Noland, Mercer; and Mrs. C. M. Turman, Broad Run, also Mrs. Henry Fairfax, the Rev. J. A. Welburn, Mrs. J. A. Speer, Dr. W. O. Bailey, Mrs. Paul Mellon, and Mrs. Eustis.

Three Girls, Boy Found Asleep in Field After 'Trip'

Charlottesville, Va., Sept. 30.—Starting out "to see the world," as one of their number said, in a note left for her mother, four school children, whose ages range from 9 to 12, caused their parents anxiety until their whereabouts was discovered by a posse shortly after midnight Thursday.

The four disappeared on their bicycles about 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon and were found in a field on the Hydraulic road, 12 miles north of the city—all huddled under one blanket and sound asleep. Their bedfellows were two stray cats.

The four were Joan Weinberg, 9; Charles Richardson, 9; Marie Richardson, 12, and Polly Watts, 11. When they failed to put in their appearance at supper time, their parents became concerned. Police were notified and their disappearance announced over the radio.

South Bend, Ind., Sept. 30.—A sharply angled place-kick by another one of those unheralded substitute quarterbacks of Notre Dame today conquered Purdue, 3 to 0, before the largest opening day crowd in the 51 years of intercollegiate football at Notre Dame.

Throttled on the ground during the entire first half by Purdue's hard-charging defense, Notre Dame finally thrust it back with a series of deadly punts early in the third period and laid the groundwork for the only offensive thrill of the day for the 40,000 fans packed into the brown stone stadium.

Kelleher the Hero

John Charles Kelleher, substitute Irish quarterback for two years, raced from the bench when the Notre Dame attack suddenly stalled on Purdue's 8-yard line after a march of 28 yards. On fourth down—Kelleher's first play—he kicked the ball squarely between the goal posts from a difficult angle on the 16-yard line.

It was the second and last time the Irish, leading candidate for the mythical national championship, penetrated deeply enough into Purdue territory to make a scoring threat.

In the second period, Halfback Lou Zontini missed an attempted placement from the 17-yard line after he and Steve Sitko had lugged the ball from Purdue's 35-yard line to the 10.

Punting Duel

All through the first half Notre Dame's Bob Saggau and Milt Piepul drove Purdue back with siege-gun punts, but not until the third period, when Saggau booted one 48 yards to Purdue's 12-yard line, did the indirect assault produce results.

Jack Brown, of Purdue, kicked back and Sitko scooped the ball and raced 18 yards to Purdue's 34. Zontini cut 11 yards through center and 4 more through rightguard. Joe Thesing started around his own left end, hurdled Brown, who had been sent sprawling by Sitko's crisp block in the open field, and squirmed down to the 5-yard line before he was tripped and fell out of bounds.

There Purdue stiffened, held Sag-

A Maryland Pass Backfires as Terps Beat Tigers, 26-0

Diagram above depicts a play that occurred in second period of Maryland-Hampden-Sydney. Boya's pass, intended for Bernie Ulman, was hurried and went far wide of its mark and into the hands of Frank Sullivan, Tigers' center, who caught the ball but dropped it. The referee ruled incomplete pass

Mondorff and Murphy Lead Terps' Attack

Big Pershing and Little Joe Have Hand In All Four Touchdowns; Maryland Shows Rugged, Speedy Eleven in Opening Game

By Jack Munhall.

Big, swashbuckling Pershing Mondorff and frail, speedy litle Joe Murphy formed an odd but terrifying backfield combination for Maryland against Hampden-Sydney yesterday as they led an unusually fast and rugged Terrapin eleven to a 26-to-0 opening victory at College Park.

Mondorff, reveling in his new role of a triple threat back, did a great job of line smashing and forward passing, and Murphy, running up to his reputation as Southern Conference dash champion, turned in superlative performances that left 3,000 fans with the impression that Coach Dobson's luck has changed for the better.

Murphy, still a bit green, nevertheless showed promise of becoming Maryland's best climax runner since Frank Guckeyson and also passed surprisingly well. Mondorff, a converted blocking back who is returning to the line-up after a year's absence due to illness, was fully as valuable as Murphy both carrying the ball or throwing it, usually to End Francis Beamer.

Between the two of them they had a hand in all of Maryland's four touchdowns which were scored two in the first period and one in each of the second and fourth quarters. Murphy personally attended to the

Berkeley, Calif., Sept. 30 (INS).—Coach A. A. Stagg's Bengals from the college of the Pacific scored a startling upset this afternoon when they beat the California Golden Bears, 6 to 0.

STAGG

The Bengals won the second game of the opening day doubleheaders, designed to give all the Bears a chance to play. California beat the California Aggies, 32 to 14, in the opener, after trailing, 14 to 0, at half time.

Three fumbled punts by Tony Firpo, California safety man in the Pacific game, kept the Bears in their own territory for the greater part of the afternoon. They never got inside the Pacific 30.

Green Wave Nips Clemson By 7-6 Score

By the Associated Press

New Orleans, Sept. 30.—The Tulane Green Wave launched its bid for national aeclaim today before 25,000 spectators with a narrow and unconvincing victory, 7 to 6, over Clemson College, whose superior generalship gave it a lead at half time.

Red Kellogg saved the game for Tulane near the end of the third quarter after Gloden got away from Clemson's 25-yard line for an electrifying 39-yard-run through a wide hole opened up by Tulane's right forward wall.

Kellogg Converts

Almost unaided, the great Tulane halfback began punching right and left in efforts which netted 24 yards. With the ball on the goal line Kellogg, behind a powerhouse, shoved it over and converted.

A fighting Clemson team put the ball into touchdown position at the end of the first quarter following a brief passing attack. Kellogg broke through to take one misdirected aerial but the ball went to Clemson for interference.

Trexler, substituting for Timmons, found one of the rare Tulane line's holes and picked up 14 yards. Then McFadden rifled a 20-yard pass to Blalock, who had only to lope 8 yards for the touchdown.

McFadden's effort for the point was smothered.

Clemson opened up another aerial attack in the fourth, but McFadden's campaign was ended when he was smothered by three Greenies.

Outrushed throughout, Clemson held an effective superiority throughout the first half by superior generalship and the accurate quick-kicking of McFadden, who was con-

Navy Defeats Indian Eleven In Debut, 31-6

William and Mary Is Tartar in 1st Half; 13,000 See Battle

Special Dispatch to The Post

Annapolis, Sept. 30.—William and Mary College sent its usual scrappy team to Annapolis today, played the Naval Academy Midshpmen to a 6 to 6 standoff in the first half, but a fast and rip-snorting attack of the heavier Navy lads in the later stages bowled it in defeat, 31 to 6.

Replete with open play, the game kept some 13,000 fans keyed to a high pitch throughout, the only disturbing element being the intense heat.

Bergner Missing

The game marked Navy's 1939 debut, also the inaugural of a new coaching regime, headed by Maj. Emery E. Larson, U. S. Marine Corps, a former midshipman who starred on Navy football and lacrosse teams. While errors of commission and omission were noted in the battle, the net result augured well for a successful season.

The Middies entered the contest sans the services of Capt. Al Bergner, stalwart tackle, and five other regulars, who are nursing injuries. This undoubtedly proved a handicap, but a strong and representative aggregation trotted on the turf of Farragut Field to defend the Blue and Gold. Aside from this, the Navy mentors started their strongest combination against the invaders, only to find after the early

Army Eleven Extended by Furman, 16-7

Cadet's Touchdown In Last Minute Clinches Victory

By the Associated Press

West Point, N. Y., Sept. 30.—Army's football power house had to use all its volts today to turn back the threat of a sturdy Furman University eleven, and when dusk cloaked Michie Stadium the 7,000 spectators who watched the Cadets turn in a 16-to-7 victory weren't quite sure whether Army is the national threat it is painted or whether Furman was a sleeper.

The latter idea predominated, however, as the Southerners, with a bevy of fine backs and a concrete line, carried the fight to the Soldiers a goodly share of the time, and saw drive after drive of their own fade when pay dirt loomed, the threats often killed by their own misplays.

Playing alert, aggressive ball and showing a mechanical perfection on offense, Furman kept the hearts of the 7,000 in their throats until the last 45 seconds, when a final Army touchdown clinched the issue.

Scores Bunched in 2d

The other scores all came in the second quarter. Late in the first period Army, with some sharp running by Jere Maupin, drove to the Furman 4.

On the second play of the second period, Maupin dove over for a touchdown, and Art Frontczak place-kicked the extra point. Shortly after, when an Army drive had been stymied on the Furman 8,

Challedon Wins 'Cap Johnstown Is Retired

Brann's Ace Is 5 Length Victor in $15,000 Feature

By Walter Haight

A Staff Correspondent.

Havre de Grace, Md., Sept. 30.—Under a tight grip, W. L. Brann's mighty Challedon flashed across the finish line five lengths in front of his nearest rival to win the $15,000 added Havre de Grace Handicap and take the lead for the Nation's horses in money won for 1939. Splashing through the mud in almost the exact manner in which he won the Preakness last May, Challedon passed ambitious leaders in the stretch and was "crying to run" more after the finish, the outrider having to assist Jockey Georgie Woolf in bringing the Frederick County Express back to the judges' stand.

"I could have done anything I wanted with this colt," said Woolf after the race. "He could have won today had the race been a mile or a mile and a half. As it was I let him run only for a sixteenth of a mile."

Only five horses marched postward with Challedon. While many trainers in the original field wanted to meet him on a fast track, the overnight rains which turned the track into a sea of mud changed their minds.

Porter's Mite, conqueror of Challedon in the mud in a previous race, finished next to last today and Nedayr, running in the colors of

William Woodward's Kentucky Derby Winner Out for Good

Belmont Park, N. Y., Sept. 30 (AP). William Woodward's 3-year-old colt Johnstown, regarded as the champion of his age until his crushing defeat in the Arlington classic last July, has been permanently retired, his owner announced in a statement issued here before 2 o'clock this afternoon. Johnstown was scratched out of the mile and five furlong Lawrence realization, which was no surprise with the track still wet and slow from overnight rain, a condition unfavorable to the Belair bullet.

Mrs. Payne Whitney's Hash, favored at 11 to 20, after lagging in the early running of the realization drew away from Chip in after straightening out in the stretch to win in the good time of 2:42 3-5.

Mr. Woodward explained that the colt has not been "right" since the Dawyer at Aqueduct last June, and that the colt had since met with a series of reverses which mad it advisable to retire him. Johnstown this year won seven of his nine starts for earnings of $137,895, and last year scored in seven out of 12 races, earning $31,420. His total is $169,310. Big Green Eleven Overrides St. Lawrence, 41-9

Hanover, N. H., Sept. 30 (U.P.).—Dartmouth's "Big Green" warriors opened their football season today with a 41-to-9 victory over little St. Lawrence, scoring in every period before 6,000 fans.

St. Lawrence scored only in the fourth, after Coach Earl Blaik had sent in Dartmouth's third-stringers. Left Halfback Bill Hutchinson starred for Dartmouth, passing to one touchdown and scoring two others.

Blaik's second team played the entire second period and produced the two most spectacular scoring plays of the day. Buford Hayden sprinted 55 yards for a touchdown and later took a pass from Jim Bauman for a 41-yard scoring play.

Pirates Name Frankie Frisch Pilot

By International News Service

Pittsburgh, Sept. 30. — Frankie Frisch, the sparkling "Fordham Flash" of yesteryear, tonight was named manager of the Pittsburgh Pirates baseball team for the next two years.

Bill Benswanger, president of the Bucs, announced Frisch had accepted terms via the long-distance telephone this morning. He refused, however, to divulge any of the terms other than it was a two-year agreement.

A contract likely will be signed in New York Tuesday when Frisch will meet with Benswanger and Harold Joseph (Pie) Traynor, whom he succeeds as Pirate manager. All three will be in Gotham to attend the league's annual draft meeting.

Club officials hinted the announcement would have been made earlier except for some haggling over the length of the contract. Frisch, it was disclosed, sought a three-year pact, while Benswanger insisted it be for one year, in keeping with the club's policy.

A compormise on two years was reached in the phone call with the veteran infielder who is now in Boston where he was attached to a radio station broadcasting baseball games. Frisch recently severed connections with the New England broadcasting network, leading to immediate speculation that he had been signed to pilot the wobbling Buccaneers.

Benswanger declared that three others were considered for the post, but that Frisch had been his first choice because he is "an experienced, aggressive, intelligent and alert leader."

He declined to disclose the names of the others mentioned for the job but said one was a major leaguer and the other two were in the minors. t was believed that Jimmy Wilson, at present a coach with the National League champs, the Cincinnati Reds, was the major league man involved.

Seattle, Sept. 30.—Pittsburgh's Panthers, who traveled the 2,600 miles from Pittsburgh to Seattle by plane, took to the air again today, completing 12 of 18 passes for an easy 27 to 6 victory over the University of Washington Huskies in an intersectional football opener before 25,000 fans.

The Pitt aerial circus took command in the first 5 minutes but it looked for a while in the third period as though the weary Panther airmen were heading for the hangar for repairs.

Lightning-fast backfield work by Dick Cassiano, only remaining member of Pitt's 1938 "dream backfield," and Ben Kish, rugged 200-pound quarterback, was a deciding factor for the Easterners. The Pitt attack wasted no time getting upder way, either by land or by air, and "quickie" passes had the Husky defenders dizzy.

Pitt Scores

Washington took the opening kickoff and punted immediately. Starting on their own 31, the Panthers interspersed long ground gainers with passes to travel 69 yards for their first score. It came on a fourth down 20-yard pass from Emil Narick to Joe Rettinger, who caught the ball in the end zone.

Partly blocked punts by lanky End John Dickinson led to Pitt's second and fourth touchdowns. Dickinson recovered one on the husky 44 in the second period, and Cassiano went over nine plays later.

Blocked Punt

In the final quarter Dickinson blocked another punt by Dean McAdams in the Husky end zone, the ball zooming skyward and coming to rest in the clutches of Tackle Ted Konetsky on the Husky 2. Kish went over three plays later.

The final Pitt score came in the last quarter. Center Dick Fullerton set it up with a 44-yard pass interception, running to the Husky 9. Cassiano passed to Kish for the score. Rettinger converted twice, Kish once.

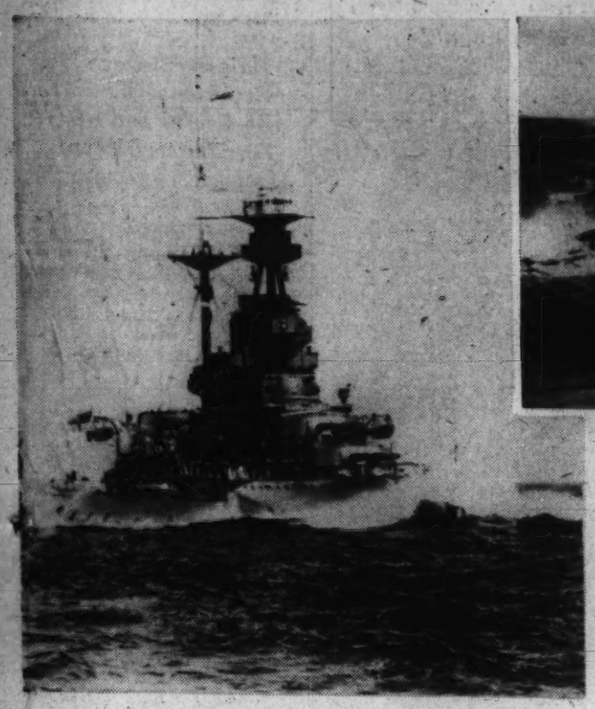
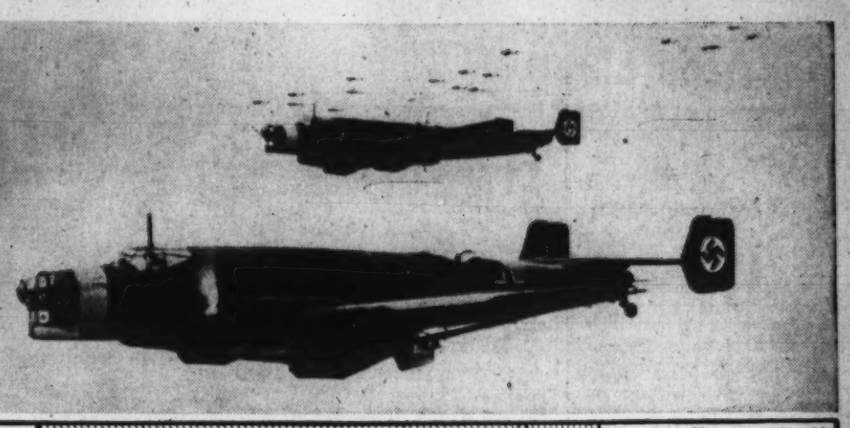
The War in Europe: Scene of Action Shifts to Sea and Air





Battleships Vs. Planes

German Bombers Tackle British Fleet

By Edward T. Folliard.

When the late Gen. "Billy" Mitchell was taunting the admirals back in 1920, telling them that the airplane had made the battleship obsolete, Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels turned on him contemptuously.

"Bring on your airplanes and bombs," he said, in effect. "I will stand out on the deck of a battleship with my head bared."

Fortunately, Mr. Daniels did no such thing, and now, at the age of 77, he is our Ambassador to Mexico. In July, 1921, the Navy turned over to the Army two war prizes, the German battleships Frankfort and Ostfriesland. A squadron of bombers from Langley Field rained bombs on them 60 miles off the Virginia Capes, sending both to Davy Jones locker.

It took a lot of direct hits to do it, however, and besides the old battlewagons were merely drifting and had no way of fighting back. Neither this demonstration nor those that were to follow settled the argument as to the relative merits of the airplane and the battleship. Nor has it been definitely settled yet.

For a time last week, it looked as if the great show-down had come. Some 20 German bombing planes (or maybe it was only 14) winged their way over the North Sea and swooped down on a squadron of British warships engaged in blockading the Reich.

What happened in that dramatic and historic clash is not yet clear. Somebody in Berlin or London clamped an embargo on the truth. On Wednesday the following German communique was issued:

"The German air forces yesterday successfully attacked English naval forces, consisting of battleships, one aircraft carrier, cruisers and destroyers, in the middle of the North Sea. Apart from one aircraft carrier which was destroyed, several hits were registered on one battleship.

"Our airplanes suffered no losses.

"An 1,100-pound bomb scored a direct hit on the British aircraft carrier. Two 550-pound bombs struck forward and midships of the battleship.

"It is unnecessary to elaborate on the effect of these heaviest of bombs. The German planes were not hit and returned to their home field."

And now the British communique: If it is true, a bare-headed Josephus Daniels, or a Winston Churchill, would have been perfectly safe with the British squadron. It said:

"Yesterday afternoon in the middle of the North Sea a squadron of British capital ships, together with an aircraft carrier, cruisers and destroyers, were attacked by about 20 German aircraft.

"No British ship was hit and no British casualties were incurred. One German flying boat was shot down and another is reported to be badly damaged."

To sum up, the North Sea scrap seemingly brought comfort to both sides. The peoples of England and Germany were both jubilant, the English because they no longer doubted that British sea power could withstand war from the air, and the Germans because they felt that the great Nazi air force had the British fleet on the run.

Naval experts here took the view that the big show-down had not yet come. That they were right was borne out by dispatches from Berlin, which confessed that Wednesday's sortie over the North Sea was merely an experiment or feeler. Ultimately, no doubt, the Germans will put on a real show against British sea power, sending out not 20 planes, but hundreds of them, wave after wave. When it comes it ought to be the most spectacular conflict in all history.

Meantime, the world will continue to speculate over the merits of the two weapons. If the layman turns to the experts of our own War and Navy departments, and demands a yes or no answer, he is going to be disappointed. The problem is not that simple.

History shows that, sooner or later, defense always catches up with offense. Thus the knight's armor was the answer to the arrow, the spear and the battle ax. When gunpowder came, people predicted that it would put an end to war. The slaughter, they said, would be too horrible.

But gunpowder simply led fighting men to seek cover and to fight further apart. The result was that fewer were killed than in the old-style hand-to-hand combat.

The answer to the submarine was the convoy system and the depth charge. Poison gas brought the gas brought the gas mask. And that gets us down to the battleship and its defense against the airplane.

The modern battleship has two protective decks, two layers of steel 10 to 12 inches in thickness. It has armored turrets in which are highly efficient anti-aircraft guns. It has machine guns and "pom pom" or "hose" guns, which emit a solid stream of death-dealing slugs. It keeps moving, zig-zagging when attacked. Finally, it has its own planes and the planes of its accompanying aircraft carrier. (The British say that the two German planes brought down in the North Sea battle were winged by planes from their aircraft carrier.)

It was a month ago today that Great Britain and France went to war with Germany, after Hitler had refused to call off his invasion of Poland. With the fall of Warsaw, it would seem patent that only one land front now remains—the Western Front.

But many observers, including some in Germany, are not so sure. They don't think that Hitler will ever be able to relax his vigilance in the East, where a "friendly" Russian army has moved up to supplant the vanquished Poles—moved up 200 miles nearer the German frontier.

But assuming that the Western Front is all that remains, what is the prospect? Judging from dispatches from the belligerent capitals, nothing spectacular can be expected soon on that front. The British and French are not willing to pay the blood price that would be involved in trying to crack the Siegfried Line. And the same goes for the Germans with respect to the even stronger Maginot Line.

These are said to be the British and French objectives:

1. A policy of continuously worrying the Germans on the Western Front as a cat worries a mouse, but no dismal offensive against the Siegfried Line as was undertaken on the Somme and at Passchendaele in the World War.

2. Every effort to be made to find another frontier on which to attack the Germans with land forces backed by the British and French air forces.

3. Economic warfare to be waged to the hilt, including intensive efforts to build up and maintain huge allied reserves of materials and including strict enforcement of the blockade of the Reich.

The Germans objectives, according to dispatches from Berlin, are:

1. Intensification of submarine warfare in an effort to break the British blockade and to starve out Britain with her own powerful weapon.

2. Incessant air attacks on the British fleet, naval bases, merchant ships, convoys and important military objectives in both Britain and France.

The outlook therefore is for much greater activity in the air, particularly by the Germans. And, unless all the signs are wrong, the chief target of Germany's air assault will be Britain.

"Give me 20,000 airplanes and I'll be master of Europe in a week!"

Thus boasted Marshall Hermann Goering, father of the great Nazi air fleet, five years ago. He doesn't yet have 20,000 planes—at least, not first class ones. He does, however, have the most formidable air fleet in the world, and there is every reason to believe that he intends to use it.

The summary for the fourth week of the war:

Land

A great pall of smoke hung over Warsaw last week, hiding a great city that had become a shambles. Buildings were in ruins. Fires were so numerous that no fire-fighting force could cope with them. Bodies of the dead lay everywhere. The living were running out of food and ammunition. The water mains were shattered, too. Bombs and shells continued to reduce the city to nothingness.

Out of this inferno late Tuesday evening came a Polish officer bearing a white flag. He asked for a truce to evacuate the civilian population and the wounded. The Germans refused and demanded an unconditional surrender. The Polish officer went back to the inferno.

Shortly before midnight Wednesday, another Polish officer, a major, came out of the curtain of smoke. He was taken to the German army headquarters, and there, after a cordial reception, he arranged for the surrender of the city and the 120,000 troops that had been defending it.

One other thing remained to be done. The Polish major had brought a letter from Gen. Rommel, commander of the Polish army around Warsaw, ordering the commander of Modlin, the Polish fort outside Warsaw, to capitulate. The major and an escort of German officers went to the battle line outside Modlin, preceded by two German soldiers carrying a white banner. The commander of Modlin was ordered to run up a white flag by 6 a. m. Thursday morning.

A little later the flag went up and the thunder of the bombardment ceased. Once again the Germans announced that the Polish war was over. They had made the same announcement twice before. But even now the last shot had not been fired. Up in the north, on the Hela Peninsula near Danzig, 2,000 Polish soldiers were still holding out, spoiling the record of a mighty blitzkreig.

Meantime the Germans, loaded down with Polish flags and Polish eagles, were moving out for the western front. They were headed for a foe who would be a much tougher nut than the poorly trained, poorly equipped, outnumbered Poles. But the will to conquer was strong in them. The inscriptions on their caissons and trucks proclaimed as much:

"To hell with Poland and England!" "Warsaw-Paris express."

Graphic stories continued to come from the Western Front. They told of fighting in no-man's-land, of artillery duels and air battles. Here in Washington, however, military men continued to insist that nothing really important has yet happened on the Western Front.

They didn't mean to be cold-blooded about it. They fully realized that men were fighting and dying heroically on that front. They were simply making the military man's point that until a wedge had been driven either in the Siegfried Line or the Maginot Line, or around the flanks of either line, all was relatively quiet along the Western Front.

A correspondent with the British Army in France sent back a story that said in part:

"The first British Artillery units are now installed.

"When I called at the headquarters of one of the units they invited me to tea in their beautiful country home . . . A captain was worrying what to do about one of his men who had written home in Welsh. It was decided that he would translate it into English for censorship purposes . . ."

Louis P. Lochner, of the A. P., went up to the front on the German side and wrote of how he stood with a German general in full view of the French. No shots were fired, he said, and he then went on to tell of seeing the French poilus fishing, riding bicycles or stretched out in the autumn sunshine.

But wars get worse, never better, and some day, no doubt, the stories from the Western Front won't be so idyllic.

In a long-range war, the Allies may win by their ability to blockade German ports and sweep German shipping off the seas. So events in the area shown on this map are vital to the course of the war.

Most of them are unspectacular—ceaseless patrolling by Britain to see that no German vessel enters or leaves the North Sea, and by Germany to see that no British warships slip into the Baltic; the tending of mine fields; the sinking or capture of supply-laden freighters.

But last week there was drama in the North Sea, as German bombers attacked British warships, and English planes again raided German naval bases.

The first effort of both sides in sea warfare is to protect their coastlines from attack. For this they use their naval and air bases, patrols by submarines and destroyers, and mine fields through which only the nation laying the mines knows the channels. War planes are stationed at each naval base. Besides protecting the coast, guarding friendly shipping and blockading the enemy, patrols hamper the other side's mine laying and sweeping activities.

Mined areas are the most treacherous of all zones in war times. They are used both for protection of strategic areas and to obstruct the enemy in his own zone. They must be constantly tended, else they will be swept up by opposing naval units.

Since British strategic defenses lock up German shipping, Germany's chief weapon in this war is the submarine blockade shown here, and another in the Atlantic. Her Russian treaty and her conquest of Poland give her a backdoor entrance for supplies, but how effective that will be is uncertain.

Sea

The sinking of the British aircraft carrier Courageous by a German submarine two weeks ago today gave England its greatest shock of the war. Something—some kind of good news—was needed to offset it, and last Tuesday the First Lord of the Admiralty, buoyant Winston Churchill, came through with such news.

Great Britain, he said, had Germany's submarines on the run. That submarine losses should have been heavy at the outset, he said, was to be expected. Some 2,000 British ships were at sea when the war started. In the first week, he said, 65,000 tons of British shipng were sunk; in the second, 46,000 tons; in the third, only 21,000 tons.

"We have actually arrested, seized and converted to our own use 67,000 tons more of German merchandise than has been sunk in our own ships," Churchill said.

Meantime, he pointed out, Britsh ships were being armed with anti-submarine guns and they were traveling only in convoys. British counterattacks, Churchill said, already had removed "a quarter, and perhaps a third" of Germany's submarines.

Up until Friday German submarines had sunk 31 British ships. In the same period in 1917, when unrestricted submarine war was at its heighth, U-boats sank 111.

Chief sufferers last week in the submarine warfare were two neutrals, Norway and Sweden, which between them lost four vessels. All four were carrying supplies to England.

Aiding the submarine commanders were spies and airplanes. The spies in Norway and Sweden apparently were informing the German navy of what ships were sailing, what they were carrying and where they were going. The airplanes were spotting the ships for the U-boat commanders.

Air

No. 1 sensation of the war was the sinking of the Athenia a month ago tonight. No. 2 came the next day—the daring raid of a British air squadron on two German naval bases near the Kiel Canal.

Like last week's North Sea battle, the British and German gave out different versions of that raid. The British said they made direct hits on a German "pocket battleship," and they admitted some losses. The Germans denied the hits, said they had brought down five out of 12 British planes.

Last Tuesday the Royal Air Force sent out another detachment of raiders, this time to bomb a German naval squadron off Helgoland. The expedition, it would appear, was disastrous. The Germans claimed that their own pursuit planes went after the British and shot down five of them, allowing only one to escape. That is a heavy mortality rate, heavier than

Majority of U. S. Voters Still Opposed to Third Term, Survey Shows

But War Has Shortened Odds on FDR

And if Conflict Continues in 1940, 52% Say They Would Vote for Him

By Dr. George Gallup,
Director, American Institute of Public Opinion.

Princeton, N. J., Oct. 1.—After a month of war in Europe the Nation-wide surveys of the American Institute of Public Opinion reflect a definite upturn in sentiment for a Roosevelt third-term — paralleling the increase in the number approving the President's Administration which was reported a week ago.

GALLUP

Not only is third-term sentiment higher today than before war began, but it is higher than it has been in any month since President Roosevelt resumed office in 1936, the survey shows.

Polling a cross-section of men and women in every State, so selected as to represent as perfectly as possible the 45,000,000 who vote in Presidential elections, the Institute asked:

"If President Roosevelt runs for a third term will you vote for him?"

Whereas 40 per cent of those interviewed in the Institute's August survey said they would vote for a third term, 43 per cent now say they would vote for him.

In other words, although a majority of American voters are still opposed to another term for Mr. Roosevelt, the first impact of fighting abroad has apparently shortened the odds against the President if he chooses to run.

The trend of opinion over the past five months has been:

	Would Vote For 3d Term	Would Not Vote For 3d Term
May, 1939	33%	67%
August	40	60
TODAY	43	57

With Republicans (i. e., those who voted for Landon in 1936) almost unanimously opposed to a third term, the increase in Roosevelt's third-term popularity has come from Democrats previously cool to the idea.

The survey shows that a good-sized majority of Democrats (66 per cent) say they will vote for Mr. Roosevelt again, but an important bloc of 34 per cent say they will not. It is with these voters, obviously, that the fate of Roosevelt's re-election in November, 1940, would rest.

If the European War continues, will more of these voters join the third-term movement? That is one of the questions which Washington political observers are weighing carefully, in spite of the difficulty of assessing the "ifs."

To get some indication of the probable attitude of American voters on the subject the Institute asked the further question:

"If the war is still going on next year, and if Roosevelt runs for a third term, would you vote for him?"

The replies show that many voters would consider their present objections to a third term in such a case. The actual vote is:

Would Vote for F. D. R.	52%
Would Vote Against	48%

Although President Roosevelt himself would call such a question an "iffy" one, it gives a new slant on a potential American attitude. Interestingly enough, when the possibility of continued fighting is suggested a small number of Republicans as well as a large majority of Democrats say they would vote for Roosevelt:

	Would Vote For Third Term If War Continues	Would Not Vote For Third Term If War Continues
Democrats	76%	24%
Republicans	10	45
All Others	55	45

The effect of the war in Europe on third term sentiment is measured in today's poll. A majority of Americans are still opposed to another four years for Mr. Roosevelt, but the number of those who would vote for the President again has greatly increased in the last few months. In May, only 33% were found ready to vote for Mr. Roosevelt in 1940; in August, the number had jumped to 40%; and today it stands at 43%.

If the war continues into 1940, the President will have a majority behind him, today's poll indicates.

Associated Press and Wide World Photos.

Just a week ago the Institute reported an increase in the popularity of President Roosevelt's present Administration. From 56.6 per cent in the August political barometer, the President's popularity had jumped to 61 per cent following the outbreak of the war.

One reason why the President's strength has increased is doubtless because of the popularity of his foreign policy. The Institute has found that President Roosevelt's positions on such issues have been far better liked than some of his domestic policies.

Four years ago, when Roosevelt was espousing his plan to reorganize the Supreme Court—a plan unpopular with a majority of Americans—the Institute found that the President's support with the voters dropped five points in four months.

The President's latest attempts to bring about a peaceful solution in Europe have been overwhelmingly approved, however, and current Institute surveys show a slight majority of voters (62 per cent), approving his request for changes in the neutrality act.

Third-Term Sentiment Strong in South

With little more than a year to go before American voters will have to choose a President, today's survey shows that third-term sentiment is strongest in the South (where it is an outright majority) and in the West and Middle Atlantic States.

Third-term sentiment is weakest in New England and in the Midwest, the figures show:

	Would Vote For 3d Term	Would Not Vote For 3d Term
New England	34%	66%
Mid. Atlantic	45	55
East Central	32	68
West Central	37	63
South	61	39
West	47	53

Give Military Training to CCC, Say 90%

Majority Believe Experience Would Be Useful and of Disciplinary Value

By Institute of Public Opinion.

Princeton, N. J., Oct. 1.—Voluntary military training for members of the Civilian Conservation Corps who want it—a proposal which has been considered in Washington in recent weeks — wins overwhelming approval from the public in a Nation - wide survey of public opinion.

Although there is no plan at present of making military training compulsory in the CCC, nine Americans in ten believe that such training should be available for CCC workers who may want a groundwork in the subject.

To measure the public's attitude on the question the American Institute of Public Opinion asked a cross-section of U. S. voters in every State:

"Should the CCC camps be permitted to give military training to the young men who want it?"

The answers, which come with remarkable unanimity from all parts of the country and all groups, are as follows:

YES	90%
NO	10%

Only one person in 25, on the average (4 per cent), said he was undecided on the question.

Fechner Calls It "Civilian" Corps

No military training has ever been given in CCC camps, and Robert Fechner, director of the CCC for the greater part of its existence, has emphasized many times that the corps with its approximately 300,000 members is a "civilian" and not a military organization.

But the majority of voters would approve voluntary military training, their comments show, because they believe in the usefulness of such experience and because of the physical and disciplinary values involved. Less than a quarter of those commenting mentioned the specific value of military training in case the United States should be drawn into war.

This latter point is the one on which opponents of any kind of military training for the CCC concentrate their fire.

It would be "undemocratic" to require military service from any single class of American youth before another, their comments declare, and some of them believe that voluntary training "would lead to compulsory training."

62% Now Favor Neutrality Act Revision

By Institute of Public Opinion.

Princeton, N. J., Oct. 1.—First returns in the Institute's new survey on the neutrality act—following President Roosevelt's speech to Congress—show opinion throughout the country running 62 per cent in favor of revision.

In the last reported survey—completed before the President's side of the case was put before Congress—the Institute found 57 per cent in favor of changing the act so that England, France and other nations might buy arms and war supplies here.

So that Americans of all persuasions can follow the trend as the debate continues, the American Institute of Public Opinion is conducting continuous Nation-wide surveys among voters in all walks of life. Joined with the Institute in making this new fact-finding service available are 97 prominent American newspapers of all shades of opinion on the neutrality issue.

A full report, giving the vote by sections of the country, by Democrats and Republicans, and by income and age groups, will be published Wednesday in The Washington Post.

Adequate Credit Flow to Small Business Held Essential to Broad Recovery

Needs Not Met by Existing Machinery, Federal Reserve Board Member Says

By Ernest G. Draper,
Member of the Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System.

May I say at the outset that the opinions expressed below are my personal views, and in no sense represent an official viewpoint of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

How small is small business? Nobody knows and nobody will ever know, because, in this instance, size is purely relative. A large concern in Noroton, Conn., looks small in New York City.

We can make the picture somewhat clearer by having our definition of small business cover both small and medium-sized concerns. Even then the argument will be endless. So let us make an arbitrary ruling. It will not satisfy everybody but it will come closer to the facts.

Let us say, speaking broadly, a small or medium-sized concern is one which hires 500 or less employes or has total assets of less than $1,000,000. If we use these guides—and they seem to me to be fair—we discover some interesting facts.

Before attempting to give any statistics, may I say that there are a number of ways by which to gauge the relative importance of small business in the national economy. If, for instance, you are a private individual and are thinking of purchasing a small concern, you naturally center your efforts upon finding out the asset value of the company, its earning power, the scope of its market, either present or potential, and other facts of that nature. But if you are looking at this problem of small business from the standpoint of the public interest, then the information that you seek will be of an essentially different character.

From the standpoint of the public interest—that is, of the people as a whole—there are three essential facts to know about small business. First, what proportion of those employed in industry are employed in small business? Second, what proportion of the national income is earned by small business; and third, what percentage of the total number of corporations and unincorporated enterprises in this country have total assets of less than $1,000,000?

According to a recent survey made by the Twentieth Century Fund—an important agency devoted to the dissemination of factual information upon a variety of economic subjects—we find:

First, that of those employed in 1929 (the latest date available) in all manufacturing industries, more than 62 per cent were employed in plants hiring 500 workers or less.

Second, that of the total national income, approximately 60 per cent is produced by small unincorporated enterprises and corporations with total assets of less than $1,000,000.

Third, that of all the corporations in this country, about 95 per cent have total assets of less than $1,000,000.

Essential to Broad Recovery

In giving these figures, I do not wish to mislead you by exaggerating the importance of small business. For instance, it is true that 95 per cent of all corporations are small. But it is also true that these 95 per cent own only 14 per cent of the total corporate assets in the country whereas the remaining 5 per cent of large corporations own 86 per cent of these assets. But, when we are judging a problem of this character from the public interest standpoint, we must remember that assets, while most important, do not tell the whole story. The whole story must also include the number of employes dependent upon the successful functioning of small business and also the relative importance of small business in providing the Nation with its yearly income.

From these two vital standpoints, our country has a stake in small business and a responsibility toward it which our Government should not shirk. While it may be true that a general recovery cannot be stimulated merely by stimulating small business, nevertheless it is likewise true that we shall never get a broad recovery of large and lasting proportions if we do not see to it that the credit flow to small business is continuous and of sufficiently generous proportions as to satisfy the legitimate needs of all classes of sound small business.

Also, it may be true that, as a result of the European war, all business will expand and that will have its temporary stimulating effect upon small business as well as large industry. Undoubtedly something of this sort may take place. But we must also remember that war conditions will bring about innumerable dislocations, some of more or less violent nature. A small business that was recently regaining a good earning basis may, through no fault of its own, be thrown off balance or permanently crippled by the indirect but devastating effects of a European conflict.

Based upon a wide variety of information which includes Government and private surveys and reports, testimony of various individuals in Government hearings and many unsolicited letters from small businessmen, it is my opinion that there are two groups of business enterprises whose needs are not adequately met by existing financial machinery:

1. Those who need short and intermediate credit but whose credit standing at the present level of business activity does not make them acceptable risks for banks. These are not misconceived, or mismanaged, or insolvent businesses, but businesses whose prospects of success are dimmed by the current economic situation.

2. Small and medium size businesses which need loan or equity capital for an intermediate or long period. The growth of Nation-wide business units, the discontinuance of bank affiliates and of underwriting by banks, the increased cost of security issues, and the disappearance of local underwriters have made it difficult for this type of business concern to find long-time credit except at prohibitive cost.

It has been said by many persons that Government should not enter further into the field of rendering financial assistance to business because by so doing it will subsidize many mismanaged, unprofitably operated concerns. I would never advocate that the Government assist in making funds available to such enterprises. However, I do believe that there are many small concerns whose liquid resources have been severely strained by a series of depression losses. There are others who require funds to finance the purchase of new machinery and equipment, or to extend or improve plant operations in order to enable them to carry on a more profitable operation.

More Demand for Long-Term Credit

In years past a substantial portion of outstanding commercial loans held by banks consisted of what would be termed today capital advances, but they were evidenced by short-term paper that was renewed from time to time as it matured. Today the demand is increasing for longer-term credit. These long-term loans are opening an avenue to banks for the expansion of their earning assets. While these loans lack liquidity and marketability, nevertheless many banks have made a number of such advances safely.

In making long or intermediate term loans, a bank not only has to consider the nonliquid and nonmarketable character of such assets, but must consider the added risks involved, such as an adverse turn in the business cycle during their life, or management and technical changes that may occur. The volume of such loans any one bank can make will depend upon the nature of its deposit liabilities; the volume of its holdings of other nonliquid and nonmarketable assets, such as real estate loans; the quality of such loans available to it, and the ratio of its capital structure to its deposits. The risks involved are such that the Federal Reserve banks as banks of discount for their member banks would be performing the proper functions of a central banking system in assisting commercial banks to make this type of credit available.

What Federal Reserve Has Done

Section 10b of the Federal Reserve act now authorizes a Federal Reserve bank, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to make an advance to a member bank on its promissory note with a maturity up to four months, when secured "to the satisfaction of such Federal Reserve bank." This makes eligible as security at Federal Reserve banks long and intermediate term loans made to business. This provision in the Federal Reserve act, although providing aid from the Federal Reserve System to member banks in making such loans, does not offer as effective co-operation as is provided for under the limited provisions of Section 13b of the Federal Reserve act. This section authorizes the Federal Reserve banks under certain circumstances and conditions to make loans to business enterprises. However, the statutory limitations of Section 13b, which provide that loans can be made only to established commercial and industrial enterprises for working capital purposes and that maximum maturities can not exceed five years, do not permit the Federal Reserve banks to operate satisfactory in meeting the present situation.

In spite of the restricted nature of the present Section 13b of the Federal Reserve act, it may be interesting to note what the Federal Reserve banks have accomplished in making direct advances, advances in co-operation with banks, and commitments to banks covering advances made by such banks, to business enterprises since June, 1934.

The Federal Reserve banks have received over 9,300 applications, amounting to $400,000,000. Of these, 2,750 were approved, amounting to $184,000,000. Approximately 1,200, amounting to $60,000,000 were declined, because the funds were not to be used for working capital purposes as required by law, or because the applicants were not established industrial or commercial enterprises. Of this grand total of $184,000,000, advances and commitments direct to borrowers amounted to only $38,000,000, whereas the total commitments to and advances through financing institutions amounted to $73,000,000.

To the end of 1938 net earnings on industrial advances, before making provision for losses, amounted to $2,800,000. Determined losses charged off aggregated $160,000, and reserves set aside to take care of estimated losses amounted to $1,865,000. This left net earnings of about $770,000 for the period June 19, 1934, to December 31, 1938. At the present time the Federal Reserve banks have outstanding $15,000,000 in advances and $11,000,000 in commitments. Of the advances outstanding about $2,500,000, are past due three months or more. The Reserve banks have acquired about $1,300,000 of miscellaneous assets in connection with the liquidation of defaulted obligations. What the final losses will be is impossible to state at this time, but present indications are that they will not be unduly large.

From the record cited above, you can see that the Federal Reserve System has materially aided banks in meeting the long-term working capital needs of business. However, it is undoubtedly true that the restrictions placed upon the Reserve banks, to which I have referred, have prevented the granting of many loans that could have otherwise been made.

Would Create Loan Corporation

For this reason, it is my belief that a plan for the creation of an Industrial Loan Corporation as an integral part of the Federal Reserve System, using the Federal Reserve banks and branches as its field force, would be of great assistance to both banks and business enterprises, both in the field of long-term financing and in those other situations mentioned previously. This is the plan originally suggested by Chairman Eccles before a Congressional committee last spring.

The Federal Reserve banks have offices already established in 36 cities (12 Federal Reserve banks and 24 branches). These offices are widely distributed in the various trade areas throughout the country, and are well qualified for such service because of their knowledge of business and economic conditions in their respective districts and their close contacts with local banking institutions. With this organization already in existence, it would be possible to commence operations with a minimum of delay and expense. Also operations could be expanded or contracted from time to time in accordance with changing conditions. The experience gained by the Board of Governors and the Federal Reserve banks in connection with industrial loan operations during the past five years would be of great aid to them in performing this service.

Briefly, the plan is this: Funds in the Treasury now set aside or used for industrial loans under the provisions of Section 13b—about $139,000,000—would be turned over to an Industrial Loan Corporation. This would involve no additional borrowing or increase in the public debt. The Board of Governors would be the Board of Directors of this corporation, and the 12 Federal Reserve banks with their 24 branches would be the field agents to pass on applications. In this way, prompt and economical action would be assured by utilizing existing machinery and experienced personnel.

The corporation would make loans or commitments or acquire preferred stock, but not more than $1,000,000 to any one borrower. Intermediate or long-term loans could be made by private lenders and insured banks protected by commitments of the corporation.

The corporation would have $100,000,000 of capital and $39,000,000 of surplus. It would have power to issue $500,000,000 of Government-guaranteed debentures. Upon liquidation, all remaining assets would go to the United States Government.

One important feature of the plan would be to set aside, out of its surplus, $25,000,000 for an insurance fund for small loans not exceeding $25,000. The Industrial Loan Corporation would guarantee 10 per cent of any lender's aggregate insured loans, so that the loss on any loan even up to 100 per cent would be absorbed by the corporation, so long as aggregate losses did not exceed one-tenth of the lender's insured loans. The principle behind this plan is the same as that in Title I of FHA. The corporation's possible losses on insured loans would be limited to the $25,000,000 set aside as an insurance fund. It has been estimated that the aggregate cost to the borrower, including insurance and service charges, would not exceed 6 per cent.

Broaden Powers Of Federal Reserve

In making this proposal, my only object is to offer what seems to me to be a practical plan for meeting the problem as it exists today. This plan does not provide for the creation of a new Government credit-granting agency, but broadens the powers of the Federal Reserve System in order to enable it to be of more effective assistance to banks and business.

Why not get to the bottom of this problem once and for all by devising legislation which is simple in character, inexpensive in operation and co-operative in its approach? In this way, we could meet the present situation squarely and without reliance on an entirely new setup of elaborate and perhaps unwieldy machinery, but with the assistance of a flexible, permanent Federal agency such as the Federal Reserve System. Then, if it should develop after the passage of such simplified legislation that the need is not as serious as anticipated, no great harm would be done and no great expense incurred. If, however, the need should prove to be greater than anticipated, the flexible machinery of this new plan would take care of this increase in demand regardless of volume.

This plan seems to me to offer the most effective solution to the difficulties in which a large and important sector of our industrial economy finds itself bogged down. The discouraging condition of small business is not primarily a result of its own inefficiency. It exists because of powerful economic disturbances over which it has no control and against which it cannot individually wage a successful fight without some reasonable amount of co-operation from a permanent public-interest agency.

Gamelin, Allies' Generalissimo, Does His Job Quietly and Efficiently

Napoleon and Foch Taught Him Strategy

His Calm and Flexibility Are Highly Prized Military Assets

By Hedley Donovan.

A machine with more than 6,000,000 living parts is in fateful motion today. It is the French army, massed in military zones blanketing a fifth of France, delivering its blows along an elbow-shaped front 300 miles long. At the control panel of this costly, complex and deadly engine stands a calm little soldier, not quite 5 feet 6, Gustave Maurice Gamelin.

Gen. Gamelin holds greater war power than any Frenchman since Napoleon. He is commander in chief of national defense, a post created only last June, carrying responsibility for operations of the army, navy and air force. Gamelin's planes and warships, under terms of the Franco-British alliance, will be blended into the British air force and navy, but the British expeditionary force on the Western Front will come under orders of the French generalissimo. The principle of unified command, adopted after 44 months of fighting in the last war, was accepted this time 17 months before the fighting began, in April, 1938.

The leader of the Franco-British land forces is 67, nearly ten years older than any other top-ranking European commander. His expression is thoughtful and slightly sad. He strikes no heroic poses. His speech, dress and life are neat and businesslike.

Gamelin inspires the confidence of civilian France, traditionally reluctant to concentrate enormous military power in one man. The Third Republic—third because two others fell to men on horseback—has found Gamelin innocent of political ambition. His decisions are subjected to but one control, the judgment of his good friend Premier Eduard Daladier.

No Blueprints Of His Strategy

What sort of war will Gamelin fight? He has not spoken for publication since hostilities began four weeks ago today. He has furnished no prewar blueprints comparable to the staff college lectures and military treatises prepared by Ferdinand Foch in the years before the struggle of 1914-18.

Gamelin's freedom from association with any particular school of military thought and his painstaking study of them all constitute his greatest strength. He has said, "I do not propose to begin this war with a second Verdun," but that is not a startling disclosure. Verdun, for the attacking army, means the hurling of a tremendous mass of men and ammunition at a single point in the enemy line. Gamelin simply says he will commit no major share of French strength to a single objective in the early months of the war. His strategy has been described as the military equivalent of French peasant thrift, an economical pursuit of a series of limited objectives. In at least two decisive moments during the World War, however, Gamelin's influence was on the side of the bold thrust for high stakes.

To say that the French generalissimo is cautious is merely to restate the fact that for months he has been preparing for war with a country twice as populous as his own. His sober respect for the German army and German Westwall do not indicate any ingrained conservatism.

Gamelin is believed to have been one of the French officers who pleaded with their government "to call Hitler's bluff" when the Nazis sent their army into the Rhineland, demilitarized by the Versailles Treaty. If it turned out the Fuehrer was not bluffing, these military men were ready to fight a preventive war with the idea of crushing the Nazi regime before it had a chance to become a real menace to France. They were confident of speedy victory, with or without British aid.

A year ago Tuesday, in one of the mysterious episodes of the Czech crisis, Gamelin flew to London to lay before British leaders a report on the state of the French army. During the previous week he had submitted a detailed analysis of the French military position to his own civilian superiors. Only the more pessimistic sections of this report had been quoted by Daladier and Bonnet to British officials, it has been charged, while Gamelin's conclusion—that the French army was ready and would win ultimate victory—was not repeated in London. Anger at distortion of his report, according to one version of the affair, led the French commander on his own initiative to fly to London and give his opinions in person. Whatever the truth of the charges against Daladier and Bonnet, the confident tenor of Gamelin's report appears well authenticated. The French army could batter its way through the half-built Siegfried Line, he told the civilian leaders. Time might be on the side of Britian and France in air force expansion and perfection of anti-aircraft defense, he is reported to have said, but time also would see disappearance of the Czech army, as a Franco-British ally in the east, and completion of the German fortifications in the west.

Flexibility His Best Trait

The dominant trait in Gamelin's thinking, whether applied to tactical details of broad politico-military problems, appears to be flexibility. It is a quality which may prove his greatest asset, for few commanders in history have led their armies into a war clouded by as many unknown quantities as the struggle in progress today. Developments and decisions in any of a dozen neutral nations may change the face of this war over night. The French generalissimo must be able to change his plans with equal speed.

Another Gamelin asset, highly prized in modern war, is calm. It is not the ponderous calm of a Joffre, whose apparent indifference to the gravest news often shielded inability to see just how and why the news was grave. Gamelin's coolness is economy. "It's no use getting angry at things," he says. "It's a matter of indifference to them."

Gamelin is a philosopher in war, a highly refined product of the intensive and exacting training system which shapes the French army's high command. German officers, according to tradition, are more thoroughly schooled in specific, technical problems of war, while Britain inclines toward the amateur spirit—pick a man of brains and character and he will do anything well. French training stresses classic principles of military strategy and insists on the broadest possible outlook, the ability to see beyond the battlefield to all the intangible factors in a nation's war effort.

The broad outlook can be a bit heady, of course. French military thinkers, in the years before the World War, became obsessed with the doctrine of the immediate offensive, based on their conception of racial elan. Historians trace several serious errors in French World War leadership to a sort of military mysticism, elevating factors of morale above such hard realities as machine guns and artillery. Gamelin, according to those who have seen him in action, is not likely to repeat the mistake. He knows the "soul" of the army, but his mind brings into sharp focus the vital details of war.

His Ancestors Famous in Army

Gamelin has been a big name in the French army for 150 years. One of the generalissimo's ancestors fought as a general for Louis XVI. His great-grandfather was military governor of Phalsbourg under Napoleon. His grandfather was the last French governor of Strasbourg before Alsace-Lorraine was annexed by Germany in 1871. Gen. Auguste Joseph Gamelin, his father, wounded at Solferino, rose to be controller general of the French army.

Maurice Gamelin never thought of any career but the army. His first school was the College Stanislas, a Catholic academy which drew its pupils from prominent families and submitted them to strict discipline. From St. Cyr, the French West Point, Gamelin graduated in 1893, first in a class of 449.

Became Pupil Of Marshal Foch

His first commission was with an Algerian regiment. He returned to France in 1896 to enter the Army Geographical Service and develop his extraordinary ability to visualize any terrain and its military meaning. Joffre later called Gamelin "map crazy." The commander's Paris office is strewn with maps, on tables mantelpiece and floor. The library in his home on Avenue Foch is full of maps. It is a wholesome hobby for a general. Today Gamelin knows the topography of the French frontier zones as well as a French peasant knows his dozen acres. It may be assumed that he also knows the lay of the land across French borders.

From the Geographical Service Gamelin went on to the Staff College and became a pupil of the future Marshal Foch. The college records still show Foch's notations on the aptitude of the young officer, whose flair for geography made a marked impression on his teachers. From 1902 to 1906 Gamelin held various field commands in France. It was eight years before the World War that Capt. Gamelin formed a significant association for himself and France. He was assigned to the staff of the Sixth Infantry Division, commanded by Joffre. He was never far from the side of Joffre for the next decade, except for a two year interlude in command of a battalion of Alpine Chasseurs.

On unimaginative engineer officer of modest colonial reputation, Joffre leaned heavily on the ideas of his brilliant aide. When the slow-moving Joffre became chief of the general staff in 1912, he took Gamelin with him as military secretary. Gamelin warned repeatedly of a German attack through Belgium in an era when most of his colleagues blithely pictured the war as opening with—and ending quickly after—a French assault, in the grand manner, on Alsace-Lorraine.

Gamelin's warnings had little influence at the time, but were remembered and contributed to his reputation when the conflict developed along the lines he had foreseen. As chief of the Bureau of Operations, Gamelin was one of the half dozen men closest to the commander in the fateful first week of September, 1914.

With Gen. Gallieni, military governor of Paris, Gamelin shares credit for opening Joffre's eyes to the opportunity for a flank attack that would roll back the German advance. It was Gamelin who wrote the historic Order No. 6, signed by Joffre: "We must profit by the reckless position of the first German army . . . The offensive will begin the morning of September 6."

Gamelin even gave the battle its name. A few days after the victory Joffre asked his officers what to call the engagement. One suggested "The Battle of the Ourcq;" another, "The Victory of the Catalaunian Fields." "The Marne," said Gamelin.

Raised to the rank of a lieutenant-colonel in November, 1914, Gamelin continued through 1915 with Joffre's staff. They were not months that increased his chief's stature, but Gamelin expanded his influence. Allied liaison officers came into frequent contact with him and saw his strength. Gen. Sears, of the British army, recalled that Joffre, "so impervious to outside impressions was said to pay great attention to this smooth, chubby little officer, who looked so young and who exercised such a mastery over himself that it seemed impossible he should ever give himself away. Eloquent and low-voiced, imperturable and distant, I have seen him in his dark chasseur uniform, following Joffre, mute if not asked to speak, precise and logical if called upon to give an opinion, always very much all there."

Gamelin was given command of a brigade in 1916, as preparation for appointment as chief of staff to Joffre. The appointment came only a week before the generalissimo was eased out of the high command. Gamelin went back to an active command, a divisional general. His operations were repeatedly cited for thoroughness of preparation and attainment of objectives at minimum cost. In early April, 1918, when Ludendorff's desperate win-or-lose offensive threatened to split the French and British armies, Gamelin was given a hastily constructed command of units from both armies and played a brilliant part in blocking the German drive.

Reputation As a Diplomat

The beginnings of his reputation as a diplomat trace back to his smooth handling of British officers. The reputation grew from 1919 to 1925 when he headed the French military mission to Brazil. It was a delicate task. German influences still pervaded the Brazilian army and French prestige in South America was heavily involved in the mission. Gamelin did a tactful job. "At certain stages," he often says, "one should persuade but not command."

An army man with authority over a navy and air force, a Frenchman in command of British troops, Gamelin will have numerous opportunities in the months ahead to put his maxim into practice.

From the leisurely pace and elaborate conventions of South American diplomacy, Gamelin was abruptly removed to a stark field of duty in Syria, where Druse warriors had revolted against the French regime.

A French detachment at Rachaya, besieged for weeks, seemed to face certain massacre. Gamelin commandeered all private cars in Beirut, packed them with troops fresh from a French transport ship and rushed them to the rescue. The garrison relieved, he moved to crush the rebellion with operations which the war ministry officially described as "extremely vigorous and noteworthy." Among the casualties were nearly 1,500 civilians in the native quarter of Damascus, attacked by French planes and artillery.

Gamelin remained in Asia Minor three years as commander of the Army of the Levant. Back in France in 1929, he was placed in command of the Twentieth Army Corps at Nanacy, nerve center of the eastern defense system. Four years later he became chief of the general staff. One more rung remained in the peace-time military hierarchy, vice presidency of the supreme war council, where the civilian war minister serves as president. Gamelin reached it in 1935.

Careful, Steady Army Improvement

Through four years of armed peace his has been the heaviest responsibility for preparations against the day the truce might end. In his requests for the materials of war, Gamelin found Leon Blum's Popular Front government as generous as the Daladier regime. As chief of staff he had already extended the Maginot Line from the zone behind Luxembourg to the English Channel, insurance against a second German invasion via Belgium. He increased the army's mobility, though mechanization has not reached the German level.

For added manpower, Gamelin had to fight a stiff campaign with the politicians. He forced the conscript period from a year up to 18 months and then to two years. There have been unspectacular but effective reforms in countless matters of detail affecting training and morale. One foreign military attache in Paris, summarizing these achievements, said last July that Gamelin "is almost solely responsible for a careful, sound, thorough, steady improvement throughout the French army . . . I have been asking questions for three years and never yet have I heard a single criticism of Gamelin."

He Told World France Would Fight

With some sense of the national confidence behind him, Gamelin began last fall to give cautious public utterance to his views on foreign policy. He has spoken at several diplomatic banquets and World War anniversary observances. At a veterans' rally at Verdun last June he made plain his hostility to "appeasement":

"With those who have fallen at Verdun we think that one will not gain the victory in hesitating before effort, just as we know that respect cannot be purchased by concessions to certain ambitions."

As oratory, in this violent age, the quiet little general's remarks sound very tame, but several experienced European observers early last summer saw these statements for what they were—an almost certain indication that France would fight. For if a soldier of such monumental discretion as Gamelin saw fit to voice such sentiments, the reasoning ran, it meant that a vast majority of Frenchmen were thinking alike, that the determination to resist Nazi designs had become almost as non-controversial a topic as the valor of France's World War dead.

Gen. Gamelin, until September 3, had spent most of 1939 in civilian dress. He likes dark, double-breasted suits and a creamy gray fedora. He and his wife, whom he married 12 years ago, are fond of opera and chamber music. The general's books run to politics, military history and geography. Like the mountain-climbing and landscape painting he used to find time for, relaxations that brought him close to terrain he might some day fight over, his reading never takes him far from his profession. Even Begson's "Creative Evolution," which aids remember seeing in Gamelin's baggage all through one summer, has a line praising the leader "who thinks like a man of action and acts like a man of thought."

In his Paris office the generalissimo works in a long room above the Boulevard des Invadies. Sharing the walls with a colorful curtain of roller maps and photographs of Foch, Petain, Weygand, Joffre. There is an oil painting of Napoleon and his staff on a German hillside.

Foch once related with wonder how Gamelin remembered the date and exact text of all orders given the French armies during the Napoleonic era. "And who gave them," Gamelin added.

U. S. Should Manufacture Its Own Ordnance

With the definite intention of the Administration and Congress to rehabilitate existing forts and to build new ones to guard its frontiers of 12,000 miles of sea and land, new arguments are thus found for the construction of a gun factory owned and operated by the United States for the manufacture of ordnance. Those favoring a national foundry also find support in a recent report released by a special committee of Congress appointed to investigate this matter. The committee urged that the time was ripe for the United States to manufacture its own guns for land and naval forces. It was found by the committee that to replace old guns and to provide guns for new forts some 521 pieces of ordnance would have to be manufactured and this could be done more cheaply and more efficiently by the government than by private foundries.

Navy Secures Drawings for New Type Of Frigate

Captain R. F. Stockton, U. S. N., who has just returned from his command as fleet-captain of the Mediterranean squadron, presented to the Navy Department "the drawings of a model of a beautiful steam-frigate on a new construction and combination of principles which in the opinion of naval officers promises to supersede any plan of building steam war-vessels hitherto adopted by any other nation. Sails will be used in fair weather and steam propulsion in calm or against an enemy force."

Since the U. S. Navy has not developed the use of steam in propelling vessels (having only one vessel thus propelled, namely the Fulton, it is now believed that special attention will be given to this type of Navy craft. Other nations, especially France and Britain, are far ahead in the use of steam-propelled frigates.

Wire Suspension Bridge Across Mississippi

ST. LOUIS, MO.—Charles Ellett's project of a wire suspension bridge across the Mississippi River opposite this city has received favorable attention from citizens generally. A favorable report on the project was made by a joint committee of the City Council and Aldermen. The committee also passed a resolution asking that sufficient funds be appropriated for the necessary survey preparatory to the erection of the bridge. The Council has already acted on the appropriation and the consideration of the Aldermen is now awaited.

Naval Vessel Leaves for Texas

BALTIMORE, MD.—The brig Brazos, recently purchased by the Republic of Texas, has left this port for Galveston. Her week's detention here was partly due to unfavorable weather conditions and partly from the fact that one of the crew was successful at drawing a prize at the lottery, "and the whole crew went on a spree. When the landsharks had all their money the men returned to the vessel and she put to sea. She is a beautiful vessel and with a good crew she will behave handsomely either in a run or a fight." Upon arrival at Galveston she will be equipped with guns and other naval paraphernalia, and will fly the single star flag of the Texan Republic.

Education of Males Versus Females

ficient instruction found in the various schools for girls in this city. Some educators have gone so far as to say that the time which a girl spends in a female institution is a waste of time. To refute this argument a prominent lady of this city has published a letter from a college boy to his father, the check-signer. This is the letter.

"Dear Farther: I have bin here almost 4 years I have nearly completed my education. I think I know enuff of lattin and greek to make a lawyer or at least a doctor. I don't think it worth while to graduate a diploma wont do me any good. Besides I am out of munny. I had to go halfs with one of the boys to buy a box of Spurmy candles that cost forty cents a pound. Please send me fifty dollars to pay little debts you didnt give me but 100 dollars pocket munny when I left home. If I dont hear from you immediately I'll come home anyhow and borry enuf to pay my way. Your dutiful son, Walter Thrift."

Cochran's New Gun Tested

PARIS, FRANCE—In the presence of a large number of army and naval officers a test was made of the newly invented three-chambered cannon designed by Mr. John Webster Cochran, the American inventor, for Mehemet Ali of Egypt. It was discharged 12 times in 58 seconds and "it is said that when properly manned it can be discharged 14 times a minute without the least danger. Six-pound balls are used.

"The gun can shoot a distance of a mile and a half. To illustrate the rapidity of firing three balls were discharged in succession, were in the air at the same time, and followed each other in a straight line."

Can Prevent "Thunder Storms"

PARIS, FRANCE—The French philosopher, M. Arago, has given public notice that his experiments to prevent thunder storms have proved successful. M. Arago's plan is to discharge "the electric fluid in clouds by means of a balloon furnished with a small lightning rod which communicates with the ground."

Germany's Military Victories Offset by Economic Losses

Unless Russia Is Willing to Finance Hitler Through a Long War, His Position Seems Hopeless

By Felix Cotten.

Seizure of the richest part of Poland contributed little to a solution of Germany's strategic materials problem. It is highly doubtful, moreover, whether the close cooperative pacts with Soviet Russia will provide the means of supplying all her needs in this respect.

This is the view of Government authorities familiar with the European situation.

The big question mark still is oil. This is the most critical of all raw materials so far as Germany is concerned. Russia can, if she wishes, provide Germany with large quantities of oil—but it is, as President Roosevelt would say, a very "iffy" question whether she will. Germany produces some oil from coal. This production, however, would have to be multiplied by about 12 to keep her mechanized war machine going. She is dependent to a considerable degree on Rumanian oil supplies, and no doubt will have to draw on Rumania in the future to greater extent than in the past.

In peacetime Venezuela and the United States were Germany's most important oil supply sources. But the British blockade has destroyed her ocean trade, and as a result she must get her oil henceforth either at home or nearby.

Another highly important problem for the Nazis is food, particularly fats, in which Germany's poverty is traditional. She gained a lot of good farm land in Poland, but probably no immediate food supplies, since food simply is not found in a prostrate, shell-torn country which, in addition to the wholesale devastation it has suffered, has had to feed a large army in order to put up some kind of defense. Experts here say there is no chance of Germany getting food from Russia, since it does not have enough to feed its own hungry mouths.

Probably the biggest problem in the whole German economic situation is how she is going to pay for goods purchased from foreign sources. Another is how long and in what way she will be able to finance at home the heavy expenditures necessary to carry on a war, but that, after all, is something else, and will be dealt with a little later.

On the question of payments hinges the extent of Russian aid. The answer likewise will determine, in a large degree, the effectiveness of the British blockade. Put in other words, this means that Germany's ability to obtain goods from foreign sources is limited by her ability to pay for them.

A nation, of course, has to pay either in goods or in cash for goods obtained from foreign sources—that is, unless it is able to buy the goods on credit. But it goes without saying that a nation engaged in war will not be able to produce goods for export to the extent that it could normally, since it will be busy supplying its own war needs. Thus, German production of manufactured goods with which to buy raw materials from abroad will be limited.

Therefore, since Germany will hardly be able to buy large quantities of Russian raw materials with goods, the question arises as to whether Russia will be very free in extending credit to Germany. This is the real test of the new-found Nazi-Soviet friendship. Will Russia see Germany through the war by supplying her goods on a credit basis? Will she deliver a limited amount of materials and then sit back and wait for payment? Or will she make Germany pay on the barrel head?

Will Russia Finance Germany?

If the Soviets follow the latter course, if their credit extensions are limited, there will be no particular advantage to Germany from the partnership, since she was able to trade with Russia before the war—to the extent that the Russians were willing to trade with people who held them up as horrible examples of all that is evil in man. It boils down to a question of whether Russia is going to finance Germany through the war by supplying oil, timber and other commodities and taking payment in spoils. If so, presumably some means for transporting goods from Russia to Germany will be found, but that after all happens to be one of the problems.

There is a stron gbelief among some well-informed observers that the Nazi-Soviet political and economic understandings are in large measure a mere front to disguise a gigantic bluffing game. But careful students admit that they do not know for sure what the situation is. The main point is that the practical value of the partnership still is to be proved.

Nazi foreign trade, as a result of the Britist blockade, has been drastically curtailed. Germany's trade has been narrowed, in fact, pretty much to the Balkan countries, Russia, Italy, Spain and the northern European countries. There may be some indirect trade through adjacent neutrals, but this presumably will not be a big factor.

All this has an important bearing on Germany's ability to pay for foreign strategic materials. It means that the Nazis no longer can swap finished products to Latin America for oil and other commodities. Her trade with the British dominions is gone. Moreover, she has suffered a tremendous loss in wealth by the diversion of manpower from productive enterprises, heretofore busily trying to expand German exports to war.

Her ability to swap goods for goods, in other words, has been limited to what adjacent countries can provide—which will not embrace, by any means, all the strategic materials which she needs. They will be able to supply quantities of materials only up to the monetary value of what they buy from Germany—that is, unless they sell to the Nazis on credit.

But a country does not sell to a country at war on credit unless it is a political ally of the country, or unless the purchasing country browbeats it into doing so. This gives rise to another question. To what extent will Germany browbeat the Balkan States into advancing credits to her, and to what extent will Great Britain prevent them from extending credits, or deem it expedient to try to prevent them?

Thus, the military chess game is being played on the economic board. Germany controls the Baltic, and thus is pretty well assured of Swedish iron ore as long as she can pay Sweden for the ore. In peacetime she had a favorable trade balance with Sweden. She is able to wield a club over the Balkans. Great Britain might try buying up supplies to keep them out of Germany's hands, but there still would be no assurance that Germany would not get them.

Of course, Germany can pay for goods to a certain extent with gold or foreign exchange already in her possession. But her "war chest" is limited, at best. Some authorities have estimated it at about $400,000,000.

The barter agreements, many of which are now useless due to restriction of foreign trade, afforded a means whereby she was able to acquire large amounts of necessary supplies from all parts of the world. War stocks of raw materials and of food were accumulated—how much is a matter of speculation.

Germany has stored up a considerable quantity of oil, but undoubtedly not enough to keep her military machine going very long. One factor in the situation is the tremendous step-up in consumption of materials, due to war. A nation consumes a great deal more of a large variety of commodities in war than in peace.

At the same time, consumption of goods is being controlled. The ban on civilian use of gasoline provides more gas for German military equipment, but this saving likewise is limited.

Endurance Test for Systems

The war is regarded by some well-informed Government officials as pretty much an endurance test for the economic systems of great Britain and France on the one hand and Germany on the other.

It would be foolish for the Allies to try to beat Germany at once on the field of battle, since Germany admitedly is superior in the immediate business of war. The strong point of the Allies is their greater resources, and Great Britain's control of the oceans, and it is only logical that they should employ these advantages to the fullest extent. Germany, although superior in immediate striking ability, is weak on the economic side—and knows it.

Thus British strategy is regarded as similar to that of the python—to strangle by slowly tightening her coils. The blockade, it is believed, in the long run will surely show results. Meanwhile, Germany, already bankrupt by any except totalitarian standards, cannot forever employ the great part of her national income in conducting war.

This is not to say that the economies of Great Britain and France will not be under a strain. But this is not the question. It is what economy is going to snap first.

Financing Has Broken Down

So far as financing the war at home is concerned, it is believed likely that Germany will revert to more orthodox methods, thrown overboard last May when Walther Funk, who succeeded Dr. Hjalmar Schact as Minister of Economics, placed in operation a system of finaning through the medium of tax anticipation certificates. This scheme has already broken down.

Presumably, Germans will respond to patriotic appeals and feed their income into the war machine until they are bled white. But there is a limit to what people will do in this respect—even the German people.

By rationing the population, the Nazis have placed a powerful brake on inflation. They know, of course, that once inflation started it would be over with them. The German people know what inflation means.

On the score of Germany's raw material gains in Poland, experts point out that what she acquired there duplicates in a large degree what she already had. She obtains zinc and lead mines, quite a quantity of good coal, pyrites for sulphuric acid, nitrates, lignite, some iron ore which does not appear to be of the highest quality, and other materials. Some of these mines were owned by American companies. There were also some British and French properties in what has now become German Poland.

But the iron ore seizures are not to be overrated, since Poland before the war did not have enough ore for her own mills and had to import ore. Germany already had plenty of coal and nitrates, and she also had substantial supplies of zinc.

Kaleidoscope: Correspondence From Foreign Capitals

The map shows Poland's resources and how they have been divided between Russia and Germany. The military demarcation line runs along the San, Vistula and Narew Rivers, giving Germany the rich industrial eastern regions of Poland, and Russia the chief farming sections and the oil wells of the southern area.

Nazis and Soviet Begin Co-operation

Berlin Swarming With Russian Military Men; German Business Firms Begin Negotiations

(Editor's note: The whole world has been puzzled by the sudden friendship of Germany and Russia, homes of two conflicting ideologies: Fascism and Communism. Everyone has been asking "Why should they get together?" and "How do they expect it to last?" Now, from Berlin, comes one answer, written by Louis P. Lochner, Associated Press staff writer who won the 1938 Pulitzer prize for his news studies of Adolf Hitler's rise to power. In the following story, Lochner reads signs now appearing in the German capital indicating that the non-aggression pact means a return to a cooperative plan that has worked to the advantage of both nations before—German technical industrial skill for Russia, in return for Russian raw materials for Germany.)

By Louis P. Lochner.

Berlin (Correspondence of the Associated Press).—The capital of the German Reich is swarming these days with Soviet Russian military men.

The presence of these officers marks outwardly the great change which is coming about in German-Soviet relations. It also marks the beginning of the close co-operation planned between the two nations—militarily, economically, industrially, and, possibly, even socially.

One of the higher officers of the army who at the same time has a high rank in the Nazi party put it thus:

"It is far easier for Nazi Germany and Communist Russia to get together and find a common basis than for the Nazis or the Communists to align themselves with democracy."

When he was reminded that foreign correspondents writing in this vein a year ago or more were denounced by German government spokesmen, he said blandly: "Of course, you were. The alliance with Russia was forced on us by events, but now we are discovering you correspondents were right."

With the demarcation line in Poland agreed upon by Russia and Germany, military delegations in Moscow and Berlin are now mapping a future joint course in other respects. There is a possibility that a military alliance similar to the German-Italian pact is one objective, it was said.

Meanwhile, business and technical bodies are perfecting their organizations to insure far-flung cooperation between the Reich and the Soviet Union in the future. The "Russia Committee of German Industry" has been organized for regulating business relations with Russia. Maj Fritz Tschunke, an expert on Russian affairs, is chairman.

One of his first acts was to inform German business firms anxious to trade with Russia that certain articles were simply not wanted there and consequently it was useless to attempt to sell them. He emphasized that Russia was not interested in articles of daily use, but wanted equipment calculated to speed up the industrialization of the Soviet.

"These articles," he said, "especially comprise equipment for factories and plants, machines and machinery used for tools, products of the apparatus-building industry, equipment for the oil industry, for the chemical and electrical industries, ships, vehicles, transport trucks and other means of communication, measuring instruments, equipment for laboratories and spare parts for all of the above named."

Technical Skill Important

Another group of men upon whom special duties devolve is the Society of German Engineers. Russia needs technical skill of all sorts. Now that relations with Britain and France have cooled, there is a better chance than ever for German technical experts to help exploit Russia's vast reservoirs of raw materials, many of which hardly have been touched.

Germany is especially interested in Russian naphtha, oil, lumber, grain, cotton, and manganese and many other ores. A government source disclosed that already 70 ships were under way from the Soviet bringing raw materials to Germany. German engineers likely will soon pour into Russia to help introduce the most modern machinery for tapping the raw materials.

Contracts even now are being signed for German experts to "install plants and render technical help," as Maj. Tschunke put it, "in connection with orders placed within the framework of the present German-Russian credit agreement."

These experts will not only install new equipment but will replace many parts in plants furnished years ago by Germany. On account of the recent difficult relations between the two countries some plants have not had replacements in years. This applies, for example, to the vast power station at Magnetogorsk, which was built by a German firm.

One difficulty is the lack of experts on both sides who know the language of the other. With continuously bad relations during the past six years, neither country has taught its young the language of the other. Special courses in Russian are now a feature in German high schools and universities.

Reviewing the past history of German-Russian relations, observers are struck with the fact that time and again the two countries have had rather close ties, but these have been severed again whenever Russian nationalism or some other "ism" became especially marked.

During the czarist period strong family ties—the last czarina was a German princess—of the royal house established Germans in many positions of influence in Russia. That ended with the World War.

At the time of the Russian revolution, the German "aristocracy" in Russia was so strong that Leon Trotsky stressed it in his writings. Hitler has claimed that the leadership of these Germans was responsible for Russia's greatness.

After the signing of the Rapallo treaty in 1922, another period of Russian-German economic and industrial collaboration ensued. It reached its peak during about the five years directly preceding Hitler's assumption of power in 1933.

Then two ideologies apparently stood in the way of better relations—Nazism and Bolshevism. In November, 1936, Russia and Germany almost came to blows over the trials of five German engineers in Russia accused of sabotage.

February, 1937, witnessed great excitement in the German press over the detention without trial of 23 Germans. Even as late as August, 1937, there were diplomatic German protests at Leningrad and Moscow over the arrests of Germans. Throughout this time, however, Russia promptly paid all bills when due.

With ideologies no longer an issue, both sides now look confidently to steady improvement of relations.

Germany's new friendship with Russia constitutes one of the greatest about face actions in German history. Hitler's "Mein Kampf" devotes many pages to showing why an alliance between German and Russia was impossible.

"In the very fact of concluding an alliance with Russia there would like the order for the next war whose end would be Germany's finish," Hitler wrote in his autobiography.

He warned against encouraging anything that might help Russia grow stronger.

the experts had expected. London made no claim that its raiders had accomplished anything, and did not deny that five British planes were shot down.

The drone of airplane motors was heard over the Netherlands late Thursday night. From the ground it sounded as if the ships were headed west. Next day the British Press Association announced that a squadron of German bombers had tried to reach the Scottish Coast, but had been driven off.

This and other events of the week made it seem a good guess that from now on the air will be an important theater of war.

Diplomacy

Dominating newspaper headlines this past week, appearing even more often than the word "war," was the word "peace." Some strange words appeared with it. Thus there was "peace threat" and "peace ultimatum."

Hitler, master of the lightning stroke, the coup, was giving Great Britain and France one more chance to pull out before he went to war against them in earnest.

The peace talk began when German Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop flew to Moscow for another conference with Russian Foreign Commissar Vyacheslaff Molotoff. The two men, who, by negotiating a non-aggression pact, paved the way for Germany's invasion of Poland, met this time to divide the "kill," and to discuss ways of halting the war.

In their joint statement, von Ribbentrop and Molotoff said that Germany and Russia, in co-operation with "other friendly powers," would try to bring hostilities to an end. Then came the threat!

"If, however, these efforts are fruitless . . . Germany and Russia will consult each other about necessary measures."

What did "necessary measures" mean? Did it mean that the two great dictatorships, mortal enemies for years, would become active military allies? In Berlin newspapermen reported that Nazi propagandists were trying very hard to give that impression.

London and Paris promptly announced that they would not let Hitler inflict peace on them. It so happened that the peace threat came on the first anniversary of Munich, with its memory of Hitler's promise that he had no more territorial aims in Europe.

The British said they would continue to fight until they had put an end to "Hitlerism." The French, remembering Hitler's well-spaced meals on Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, Memel and Poland, said:

"He will give us what he calls peace—that is, a short delay which permits Germany to digest its prey and to forge arms to snare its next prey."

France's answer, like that of Britain, was "No!"

As the Allies profess to see it, Russia continues to be as much of a menace to Germany as it is to them. Allowing Germany to do the fighting for her, Russia has been getting her share of the swag. She has cut off Germany's way to coveted Rumania and the Balkans. She has established what amounts to a protectorate over Estoniaan naval bases and thereby blocked Germany in the eastern Baltic.

It may be, of course, that the Allies are wrong and that the Red Army and the Nazi army will yet be fighting side by side. But where, military men ask, would the Red army fight? The main reason Poland would never allow Russian troops to come her aid was because she was afraid that, once in, they would never get out. Would Hitler ever let "our mortal enemies"—as he called the Communists in Mein Kampf—march into Germany to reach the Western Front?

The fourth week of the war ended with the spotlight still blazing on Hitler. From Berlin came news that the chancellor had called a meeting of the Reichstag for this week. That always means something big. The last time he called it was on September 1 when he proclaimed himself the "First Soldier of the Reich" and sent his army into Poland.

Switzerland Guards Her Frontiers, Prepared to Resist Any Invasion

By Paul Girardin
Former Colonel on the Swiss General Staff

Copyright, 1939, by New York Tribune, Inc.

Berne, Sept. 30.—Swiss neutrality, which originated as far back as 1815, when the Congress of Vienna solemnly granted it to the small Alpine republic, still is the fundamental idea on which Swiss foreign policy is based. Switzerland's neutral position has again and again been recognized by her neighbors, and in the present conflict renewals of those nations' guaranties have been received at the Palais Federal, the seat of the Swiss government at Berne.

In spite of these renewed promises and assurances, the Swiss government has taken all necessary precautionary steps. It is guarding the frontiers with its highly efficient army and is confident that it is supported by a nation ready to defend its freedom and independence to the last.

The "Anschluss" of Austria to Germany has deeply affected the strategical position of Switzerland. Up to the moment when the Germans entered Vienna the eastern frontier had played a minor part in the calculations of the Swiss General Staff. The chief efforts for fortifications up to the summer of 1938 had been made on the southern and northern frontiers.

The southern frontier has as chief points of interest for an invader the railway lines through the St. Gotthard and the Simplon Passes. The St. Gotthard fortifications may still be reckoned among the most effective known in any country, having always been kept up to date as to equipment, armament and ventilation against gas attacks. The forts are out into the solid granite rock. Good accommodations for troops, communications between the forts and a garrison of well-trained mountain troops knowing every passage in the whole St. Gotthard Massif allow full confidence that any invader will find it hard to force a passage to the interior of the country and take the tunnel. The fortifications of Mt. Ceneri, south of Bellinzona, have been built as an outpost to the St. Gotthard to give time for mobilization to the troops of the Canton du Tessin.

Defense Organized In Every Detail

The Simplon is less heavily fortified. The tunnel, of course, can easily be made impassable. The road is guarded by a fort in the Gorge of Gondo known to all foreign visitors that ever motored over the wonderful Simplon road, work of Napoleon's engineers. The whole defense of the road and the passes leading to the Valais has been entrusted to the sturdy troops of that Canton.

At the moment of an invasion every man belongs to the army. Landsturm, Landwehr and Elite know their posts and have their special tasks. Officers of different ranks have been placed in command of the special objects carefully chosen according to the individual abilities. Young mountaineers have taken charge of the guard on the highest glaciers and mountain tops. The whole defense of the Valais has been organized in every detail.

Should, nevertheless, an invader force his way over the mountains, he would find himself in a cul-de-sac, bolted in the east by the fortifications of the St. Gotthard, in the west by those of St. Maurice, while the forces of the Valais could retreat to the passes leading to the Barnese Oberland, difficult to climb and easy to defend. St. Maurice at the same time covers the descent from the Great St. Bernard, another important southern approach to Switzerland.

The northern and western frontier, up to the time of the construction of the French Maginot Line, had no permanent fortifications. In 1914, when the fighting in Alsace and in the Gap of Belfort had started, the main part of the Swiss army was drawn up in the Jura Mountains. There, temporary fortifications along the important passes were hurriedly erected and two systems of semipermanent fortifications in the regions of Morat and the Hauenstein in the west and east of the front were built as points d'appui for the maneuvering army. Some of them still have a certain importance.

But Swiss frontier defense had to adapt itself to the new conditions of warfare. It especially had to prevent a surprise attack also to the northern and western frontier. For this purpose a series of small forts have been erected from Constance along the Rhine to the western rangers of the Jura. All the bridges, railways and roads leading from the north and west to Switzerland have been mined. The forts have been permanently garrisoned by a newly organized body of frontier troops, carefully selected volunteers.

Ready for Any Surprise Attack

These voluntary frontier troops, a new feature of the Swiss army, are organized in independent companies, which have been distributed along the frontiers. Mobile, well equipped and specially trained, they have the task of warding off any surprise attack until the organizations of the territorial frontier defense, the second line, have taken their positions. In this task they are aided by the frontier guards, the frontier police organization, picked men with a thorough military training.

The eastern frontier, approximately from the Stelvio to the eastern end of the Lake of Constance, may be divided into two parts: a southern part from the Stelvio to the Scesaplana, a peak in the mountains of the Grisons, and a northern part from this peak to the lake.

The first part of this frontier does not present any new military problem. It may be held according to the same system used for the other parts of the Grisons.

Opportunities For Invader

The second part is of major importance. It offers to an invader several opportunities of reaching the Swiss Plateau, St. Gall, Zurich and Lucerne. While the roads of the central part, leading through mountainous Appenzell, may easily be held by small forces, there is an open gap at Rorschach and at Sargans, the latter of particular importance.

The next big task of Swiss fortifications work will be to close the direct way to Zurich in the defile of Sargans. Though naturally the plans of the general staff are not under public discussion, it is generally understood that a part of the large credits lately accorded to our military department for frontier defense, have already been and will be used to fortify this most important point.

The territorial frontier troops are one of the innovations of the new Swiss army organization put in force last year. Men of every class of the army living in frontier regions have been incorporated into them. They are likely to get an alarm at any time of the day and night and therefore must be ready to march without preparation. By all possible means of transportation they are hurried to their posts, where they take over the defense of the frontiers from the voluntary frontier troops, thus forming the second line of defense.

Objects of special tactical importance, like bridges, tunnels, roads, gorges, defiles, ridges of dominating character, are at once manned with special detachments and under separate commands. Light artillery and, first of all, machine guns—the arm par excellence for the defense of the cut-up, hilly Swiss territory—form the backbone of this defense. A sufficient amount of ammunition is kept near at hand, so that an effective defense seems to be assured until the regular army units, mobilizing in the interior of the country, may take up their different positions.

Unique System Of Mobilization

The Swiss army has a unique system of mobilization. Every soldier keeps his complete outfit at home, ammunition excepted. The cavalrymen have their individual horses, the cyclists their bicycles. Everything has to be in perfect order when the man enters service. Regular inspections keep a severe control in times between service. Thus the mobilization of the Swiss army is a matter of very few days. In cases of emergency, it can be hurried for units immediately needed, which can march a few hours after having gathered.

This is especially the case with the three "light brigades," bodies of troops consisting of cavalry, cyclists, light artillery on trucks and machine guns on motors. These "light brigades" form the vanguard of the regular army and may be thrown to any point where the frontier is in danger.

Special attention has been given by the general staff to the mobilization of the infantry. The Swiss railway system is largely electrified, and it is to be feared that at an outbreak of a war trains could not run, because of the vulnerability of the lines to air raids. Therefore the rendezvous of the different units of infantry and their arsenals have been decentralized and disposed over the whole country in such a way as to be reached by the majority of men, even if trains should not run. An extensive automobile service is at the disposal of the military command, as soon as a general mobilization has been ordered.

In a democracy it is always difficult to solve the problems of the supreme military command in peacetime. The Swiss constitution foresees the election of a general with supreme powers over the military and civil resources only at the moment of a general mobilization. This election has taken place only three times since the reorganization of the Swiss Confederacy in 1847. Thus, Swiss modern history knows three generals only:

Gen. Dufour, who was commander-in-chief during the interior war of the "Sounderbud" in 1847; Gen. Herzog, who was in power during the Franco-German war of 1870, and Gen. Wille, who was responsible for the defense of the country from 1914 to 1918.

French Doubt Soviet Can Fill Nazi War Needs

Effective Aid Could Only Be Given by Germanization of Russia

By John Elliott.

Copyright, 1939, by New York Tribune, Inc.

Paris, Sept. 30.—The war has undoubtedly taken a very bad turn for the Allies with the virtual intervention of Soviet Russia on the side of Germany.

Until now, people in London have been calling this conflict a "war that is no war." While the war has been prosecuted ruthlessly and relentlessly by the Germans in the east, where they have wiped out the Poles in a four weeks campaign, the fighting in the west has been of a sporadic and desultory character, confined largely to skirmishes and artillery duels. While Warsaw has been laid in ruins by German bombers, London and Paris have not once been raided from the air, although the war is now a month old.

But this idyllic situation may abruptly change over night if the British and the French reject Fuehrer Adolf Hitler's "peace ultimatum," supported by the Bolsheviks, for the calling off of hostilities on the basis of the recognition of the "liquidation" of Poland.

Prestige, honor and their own security will compel the Allies to carry on the war, however. The question then arises whether the Allies, with their naval blockade, will be able as in 1918, to force Germany to her knees if Soviet Russia proceeds to fulfill her threat to supply the Nazis with raw materials. The French believe that this all-important question can safely be answered in the affirmative.

The French doubt, first, whether the Soviets are in a position to supply Germany with the goods she needs and, secondly, whether the Germans are able to pay for them if the Russians could. The Soviet Union, it is pointed out here, requires most of what it produces for its own domestic consumption and this home demand is far from being satisfied. Will the Russians, it is asked here, tighten their belts still further in order to please Berlin?

The French recognize that these problems are not incapable of solution and that German technicians are capable of organizing and developing Russian exports. But it is regarded in Paris as exceedingly doubtful whether the Russians will favor the Germanization of the sources of supply of its raw materials. While France and Britain have at their disposal, through their colonial empires and the command of the seas, almost unlimited reserves of raw materials, Germany, it is considered here, can only hope for effective economic aid from Russia on condition that the Soviet Union permits itself to be economically dominated by the Nazis.

Another question is that of how the Reich is going to pay for the goods it wants from Russia. Nazi Germany has no cash and no credit, and in recent years it has been in the habit of doing business on a barter basis. But now, when all its factories are fully engaged in turning out munitions and its manpower is largely mobilized for war purposes, the French find it difficult to believe that the Germans are in a position to provide the manufactured articles that the Soviet Union needs.

Writing in "L'Epoque," Bernard Lavergne declares that the fear that Germany can be kept going by massive supplies of raw materials from Russia is "chimerical." He gives statistics showing that the Soviet Union last year had exported merely 2,000,000 tons of petroleum when the deficit of Germany's consumption in relation to her production amounted to somewhere between 30,000,000 and 32,000,000 tons. Russian exports of petroleum, he concludes, would therefore be only a drop in comparison to now almost unlimited requirements of the German army. Even if Rumania's yearly export of 4,500,000 tons were also made available to the Reich, still her wartime needs would still be far from being satisfied.

Kaiser Wilhelm Today—A Quiet, Lonely Old Man at Doorn

Gives First Interview In Exile to American

After Twenty Years of Silence, Former German War Lord Permits Account of His Life to Be Written

Breaking a 20-year silence, the Kaiser recently granted his first interview in exile to an American woman, Mary Stuart Weyer. Mrs. Weyer, who knew Princess Hermine before her marriage to the Kaiser, spent a week this summer at Doorn, Holland, as the guest of the former German war lord and the Kaiserin. Here Mrs. Weyer gives an intimate picture of the Kaiser today. A second article by Mrs. Weyer will appear next Sunday.

By Mary Stuart Weyer.

"It is their majesties' seventeenth anniversary; I am sure you will want to congratulate them . . ."

The old general, standing there beside me in the bright, white-walled foyer of the castle at Doorn, left the sentence hanging in the air. His stocky frame stiffened, heels came together. At the far end of the room, a doorway opened, and through it briskly stepped an erect, snowy-haired man with a trim mustache and Van Dyke—Wilhelm the Second, former Kaiser of Germany.

Mary Stuart Weyer

A nerve-tingling shock of surprise surged within me as he walked toward us, followed by Kaiserin Hermine. This was midsummer, 1939. Twenty years had passed since I had last seen this man who once ruled a vast nation. And I had expected now to meet a bent and care-worn exile whose faltering stride bespoke the 80 years that time had chalked against him.

Here before me, though, was a ruddy, keen-eyed man who moved quickly across the room, smiled warmly at the members of his entourage who were gathered in one corner, and began to chat with them in clipped, strong tones.

The Kaiserin noticed me standing a little apart from the others. As I stepped forward hesitatingly, she came to greet me.

"Oh, liebe Mrs. Weyer!" she exclaimed.

And then she led the way to the former Kaiser.

"This is Mrs. Weyer—from America," she said.

The former Emperor grasped my hand in both of his with a firm, friendly grip. In the fleeting second that we stood there, the thought of his crippled arm flashed through my mind. "Which arm is it?" I asked myself, surprised at the strength of his handclasp. And then I remembered—the left.

"Permit me to congratulate you, Your Majesty, on your anniversary," I said.

He looked at Kaiserin Hermine, and the twinkle in his eye was that of any husband planning a little joke at his wife's expense.

"What anniversary?" he asked, blankly.

"Oh, the anniversary of your engagement."

He chuckled again, once more rocking back and forth on the heels of his highly polished shoes.

"Thank you," he said in perfect unaccented English, "and now please tell me about your trip. Was it cold? I have been reading so much about icebergs in the North Atlantic. I understand the ships have been forced to take a more southerly route to escape them."

Thoughts of the North Atlantic

The North Atlantic. Ships and the sea. As I looked at this intense, white-haired man standing there before me, I seemed to hear the soft flutter of calendar leaves. Ships . . . plowing through the mist-blanketed Atlantic, bringing food, iron, steel—and khaki-clad men, thousands upon thousands of them, to make invincible the armies that were challenging the might of Germany's Iron Emperor. The sea . . . dotted with hornety gray destroyers, drawing wide circles of foam around the heavily laden merchantmen under their care. Circles which the vaunted U-Boats crossed at ever increasing peril to themselves. Small wonder that this man, living quietly here at Doorn, found his mind turning often to the broad Atlantic.

And if the ship lanes interested the former Emperor in those summer months when the guns had not yet begun to rumble, how much more carefully must he be studying his charts and maps today when blackhulled submarines of the Fatherland are once more playing a deadly game of tag with allied merchantmen and men-of-war.

Now the former Kaiser was speaking again.

"I have been reading about the Gulf Stream," he said. "The way it is affecting the climate of America's eastern seaboard. And I have also been very much interested in published pictures of your two World's Fairs. They are a striking commentary on the vast expanse of your country. Two immense Fairs, and no conflict between them. Tell me something about them."

Briefly, I painted as good a word picture as I could of the New York and San Francisco expositions. I told of the thousands of Americans who were attending first one and then the other, taking advantage of special transportation rates to travel the breadth of their country.

The Kaiser showed genuine interest in everything I had to say about the United States. He is a good listener as well as a brilliant talker. And I could tell from the look in his keen blue eyes that his mind was busy contrasting the vastness of far-off America with the comparatively tiny European nations whose rubbing elbows were even then creating dangerous friction.

Convinced War Was Inevitable

Though, of course, his role has long been that of an onlooker, the former Kaiser is intensively absorbed in the European struggle. It took only a few minutes of conversation with him to convince me that he had a clear picture of what the world was facing—a clearer picture, perhaps, than that in the minds of many of the active diplomats and statesmen. But developments have since proved that he was to optimistic in one respect—the time limit.

Talking to him and to Kaiserin Hermine in that remote castle in Holland, I could see that he was convinced of the inevitability of another furious conflict. His hopes, however, were that the fatal day could be postponed. And he believed then that Europe might stave off a major war for at least a few more years.

While we were talking the Kaiserin had walked over to the other side of the room to speak to a member of the entourage. She returned now, and the former Kaiser glanced at his watch and announced that was time for the church services to begin.

We moved slowly down to the front of the long, narrow foyer which had been converted into a temporary chapel in accordance with the usual Sunday custom at the castle. The Kaiser mounted a small podium in front of which was a lecturn, its top carved and gilded in the form of an eagle.

The Kaiserin took a chair that had been placed directly in front of the podium. I was guided to a seat a little to the right and in back of her. Several members of the entourage were grouped near me, and the seats in the rear of the room were quickly filled with placid, neatly dressed members of the household staff—the chauffeur, the cook in her starched, white apron, the gardeners and other servants, about 20 in all.

The former Kaiser sat down, unceremoniously pulled the lecturn between his knees, groped in his pocket for a pair of horn-rimmed spectacles, polished them with a few quick strokes of a handkerchief and adjusted them to his eyes.

Same Service As in Berlin

Before him on the lecturn was the day's sermon. I learned later that it was an advance copy of the sermon that was being preached that very moment in the Cathedral in Berlin. Each week before the outbreak of war, a copy of the scheduled sermon was delivered to Doorn, and each week, the former Kaiser timed the devotions in his far-off castle to coincide exactly with those in the historic Cathedral in the fatherland.

So deep, now, was the silence in the little chapel that I felt almost as if some giant pump had siphoned out the air, and we were in a vacuum. Then, suddenly, the former Kaiser began to read.

"If a man hate his brother in his own heart, he does not love God . . ."

Sharp and clear the words came, and the tiny congregation leaned forward tensely, as if to make certain that not a single phrase should go unheard.

A shaft of rich, yellow sunshine streamed through a window high above, and flowed over the Kaiser's head and shoulders as he scanned the text spread before him. It seemed like a scene from a make-believe world of fantasy; like, perhaps, the setting of a play, arranged by a master technician. Could this calm, gray man in the dark suit and spats, delivering a sermon on that little platform, really be the iron-willed master who only a few swiftly moving years ago held sway over the destiny of a war-gripped nation?

I looked around the room. At the twin portraits of a glowering Dutch Crown Prince and his Princess on the side wall. Out the open door, at the silent gardens, splashed with the red of flowering rhododendrons; the typical front yard of a country squire.

"Whosoever believeth that . . . Jesus is the Christ . . . is born of God."

That clipped, staccato phrasing—three words, a split second pause, more words, another pause. That was not the speech of a simple country squire leading the devotions of his household. No. It was Wilhelm the Second, head of the royal house of Hohenzollern.

The words faded into a misty blurr of sound, and I could hear only their rhythm; short, sharp, authoritative. This was the manner of speech of an Emperor surrounded by his generals and his ministers. A bemedalled, helmeted emperor in spurred boots and braided uniform, his cape thrown back as he proudly stands before his people.

It must have taken a long time to read the closely typed, six-page sermon. But, to me, it seemed that only a few moments had passed before the former Kaiser paused, gathered his papers together, and arose stiffly. We all stood with him while he intoned the Lord's prayer.

With a quick gesture, he swept off his spectacles, put them in his pocket and strode forward off the platform. The members of the household filed out silently, and the Kaiserin asked me to come to her sitting room upstairs—a room in which I was to spend interesting hours in the next few days.

I took leave of her there, and went downstairs as she made ready to go for a walk through the gardens with the former Kaiser. When I returned to the foyer, he was still there, talking to the two generals of his entourage. We shook hands, and he smiled.

"Tomorrow," he said warmly, "you must bring your daughter."

Then he walked to a small desk in the corner, took a photograph of himself from a compartment, and handed it to me.

"Here is a picture for your little girl; please give it to her," he said.

I thanked him, and left. Walking down the front steps of the castle, I looked back over my shoulder. There was the former Emperor of Germany, sitting on the edge of a foyer table, swinging one leg, his head turned toward the door of the Kaiserin's sitting room—a perfect picture of an impatient husband waiting for his tardy wife.

THE CHAUFFEUR who picked me up at the hotel the next morning was a radiantly excited young man. Although he was a native of Doorn, he had never seen the Kaiser, and this, he assured me, in his gurgling Dutch, was a great moment in his life.

As we neared the end of our 20-mile drive, the chauffeur took off his cap, slicked back his hair and carefully put back the cap at a precise angle. So intent was he upon examining his appearance in the rear-view mirror that he almost failed to notice the two burly, blue-uniformed Dutch policemen who stepped out of the shadows at the House Doorn gateway and motioned us to a stop.

The policemen carried guns, and their flinty stare was evidence that they would not be overly-reluctant to use them if the need arose. While I was explaining that I had an appointment with the Kaiserin, the Kaiser's chauffeur arrived from the castle, climbed into our car, and we were waived inside.

A long, winding road stretches from the gatehouse to the castle steps. On all sides, as we swept by, were full-blooming rhododendrons, growing so high that only once or twice was I able to catch a glimpse of the high iron fence, surmounted by three strands of bristling barbed wire that encircles the estate.

We crossed a canal that might well have been a thirteenth century moat, and in the shallow water swam a flock of the Kaiser's pet Maillard ducks, their green necks brilliant in the morning sunlight. I had an eerie feeling as I gazed around me. When we had passed through those towering gates, we had left Holland completely behind. Here before us was Germany. A tiny fragment of one country nestling within another. But it was the peaceful Germany of another day, with no tense, drawn faces scanning the skies for bomb-laden planes.

The car slid to a stop at the castle steps, and a white-jacketed servant came down to meet me. As I followed him to the doorway, I felt again the twinge of surprise—or perhaps it was disappointment—that I had noticed at my first view of the castle. Here was no turreted stronghold such as the word "castle" usually denotes. No bristling towers, no mullioned windows. Instead, I saw a comparatively small, yellowish, stucco-like building with two rambling wings, one completely covered with ivy, and the other enfolded by a circle of tall elms.

A Walk With The Kaiserin

The servant led the way directly to the Kaiserin's sitting room. She was busily embroidering, while a radio at her side played softly. As I stepped through the doorway, Kaiserin Hermine put aside her work basket and came quickly forward to greet me.

"I am so glad you came early," she said as she grasped my hand. "We will spend the whole morning together."

We talked a few moments about my ride from Utrecht to the castle, and then Hermine asked:

"Which would you prefer—to remain here or walk through the gardens?"

When I suggested a walk, it was obvious from her expression that this was the Kaiserin's preference also. We took a narrow pathway on the right of the castle. It wound through an avenue of magnificent elms, and as we strolled I could hear resounding echoes of what seemed like hammering. At first I was puzzled by this incongruous noise that shattered the stillness which had enveloped the castle gardens. Then, suddenly, I remembered—the former Kaiser was chopping wood.

Immediately ahead was a clearing. And in the center of it was the former Emperor of Germany vigorously swinging a heavy ax that glistened in the sun. He used both hands—the afflicted left arm seemed strong and sturdy—and block after block of wood was split apart with the skill of an expert.

We stopped at the edge of the clearing and watched in silence. On one side of the former Kaiser was a neat stack of chopped wood, as high as a man's head. Around him were scattered pieces that were newly cut. A buck-toothed Dutch helper scurried about, out of range of the flying blade, picking up the kindling and adding it to the stack.

"That little shed on the right," the Kaiserin said, touching my arm. "That is where the Kaiser has his second cup of coffee after the day's chopping is done."

It was just a plain, unornamented one-room building, with an open front. Inside, was a small table and a single chair. And on the table stood a cup, a saucer and a spoon.

Then, with the rhythmic blows of the Kaiser's ax echoing in the background like the beat of an

Senate Enters Ring With Queensberry Code in Mind

By Robert C. Albright.

Not since the Marquis of Queensberry framed a code for clean boxing and Jim Corbett won the title thereunder, has the United States Senate gone into the prize ring with more nice preliminary amenities.

Courtesy, for which the Senate is said to be famous, has never handicapped a bloc that was strong enough or a majority that was big enough, from walking off with a legislative trophy or knocking out a weaker opponent, sans Queensberry rules.

And few individual Senators, given iron lungs and physique and time on their side, have resisted the temptation to slug their way to a coveted victory through the whole Senate, by use of that now tabooed practice—filibuster.

Yet the Senate is entering a battle tomorrow that will write history in the highest sense with a kind of an unwritten code for fair fighting new in Senate annals. Should it hold for even half the distance it would shatter even Senatorial courtesy precedents.

The prize, should the Administration win, is repeal of the embargo on arms to belligerents and invocation of the most drastic anti-war precautions ever set out in one neutrality bill. The trophy, should isolationist opponents triumph, would be reversion to present neutrality act standards, and denial of manufactured arms sales to France and Great Britain.

Probably not since World War days has feeling been more intense on both sides of an issue, nor have two factions been more thoroughly convinced of the rightness each of its own cause.

Given such a set of rival convictions and as much pent-up bitterness in past Senate slugfests, horseshoes would have been slipped into one or more Senatorial mitts long ere this and charges and counter charges of "Foul!" would have thundered from Capitol dome to subway.

That all no doubt will come in time, as Senators clash in hard debate, but the fact that both groups go arm in arm to the fight, in virtual agreement on procedural rules, though cloven asunder on the legislation itself, argurs well for a supreme effort at statesmanship from White House to Capitol.

Not since the President made his opening appeal for non-partisan consideration of a non-partisan question, and bi-partisan leaders accepted that condition, has there been to date any serious breach in that informal understanding.

There have and will be of course minor individual exceptions on both sides. But from leaders of each group, such as Borah, Johnson and Vandenberg, of the anti-repeal camp; Barkley, Pittman and Byrnes, of the Administration revisionists, and moving between as a peace-making intermediary, Minority Leader McNary, there has come no political smirch.

Mutual respect each of the other's sincerity has been the standard, and from this as a base there has been worked out, though not written, sworn to or attested, rules that may rival those of the famed Marquis.

Already they have carried the Administration further toward a vote, and assured more consideration for the opposition case, than would have been possible had the leaders on the one hand resorted to "pressure," or opponents on the other made use of obstructionist weapons.

Under this unsigned code, new and strange for the Senate, it was possible to carry through a committee, which formerly adamantly refused to consider it, a bill so fraught with controversy that it could have tied up the group in partisan knots for days on end and blazoned its differences to the world.

Hostilities have not been called off—they are deep-seated. And the fight will go on as advertised on the Senate floor.

But here are a few of the informal understandings, patiently arrived at, that may bring a new order and quality to Senate procedure—at least until the slugging starts:

Administration leaders agree there will be no "railroading," no "pressure," no unfair advantage taken of a numerical majority and strictly "hands off" the legislation by the President.

They agree, at least at the outset, there will be no extraordinary Senate sessions calculated to exhaust opposition speakers legitimately presenting their case. Sessions will start at noon, and probably end about 5 as usual, without the nerve-racking strain leaders can apply when they force attendance in the morning and keep school in for deep night sessions.

Opposition leaders in return agree—and again it was a loose understanding without any seal-binding promise—not to delay the bill in committee, but to aid even in expediting it to the floor. They kept that agreement, which speaks well for the rules so far.

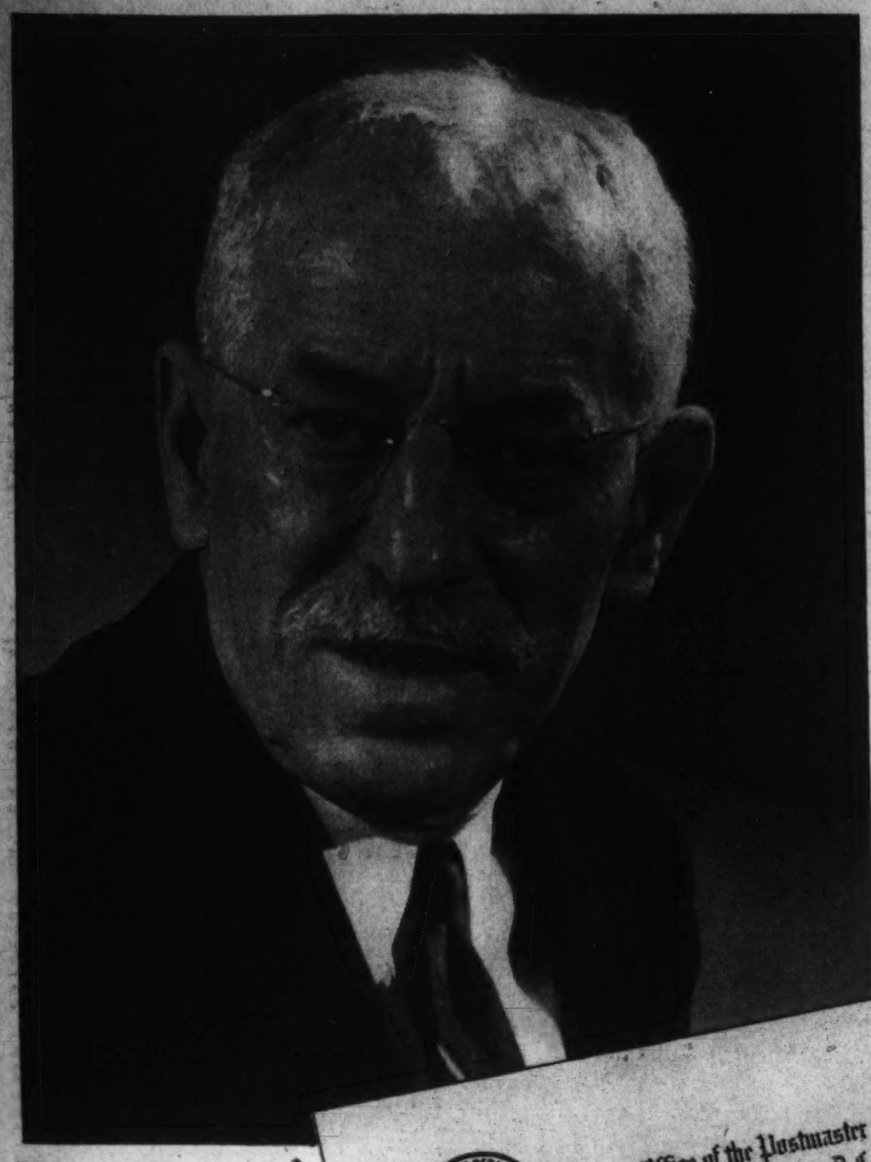
Finally they agree—and this is most important to Administratoin hopes that this session will not run into the next, and to its fear that an interminable Senate storm might demonstrate national disunity and aggravate the international situation—not to filibuster. Leaders of the opposition, at least, have pledged they will engage only in "legitimate debate." And that means speak to the point without dragging out speeches with irrelevant material and unpremeditated statements for purposes only of delay. And there is one more understanding in process of negotiation, that speakers will not be interrupted for purposes of heckling or derogatory challenge.

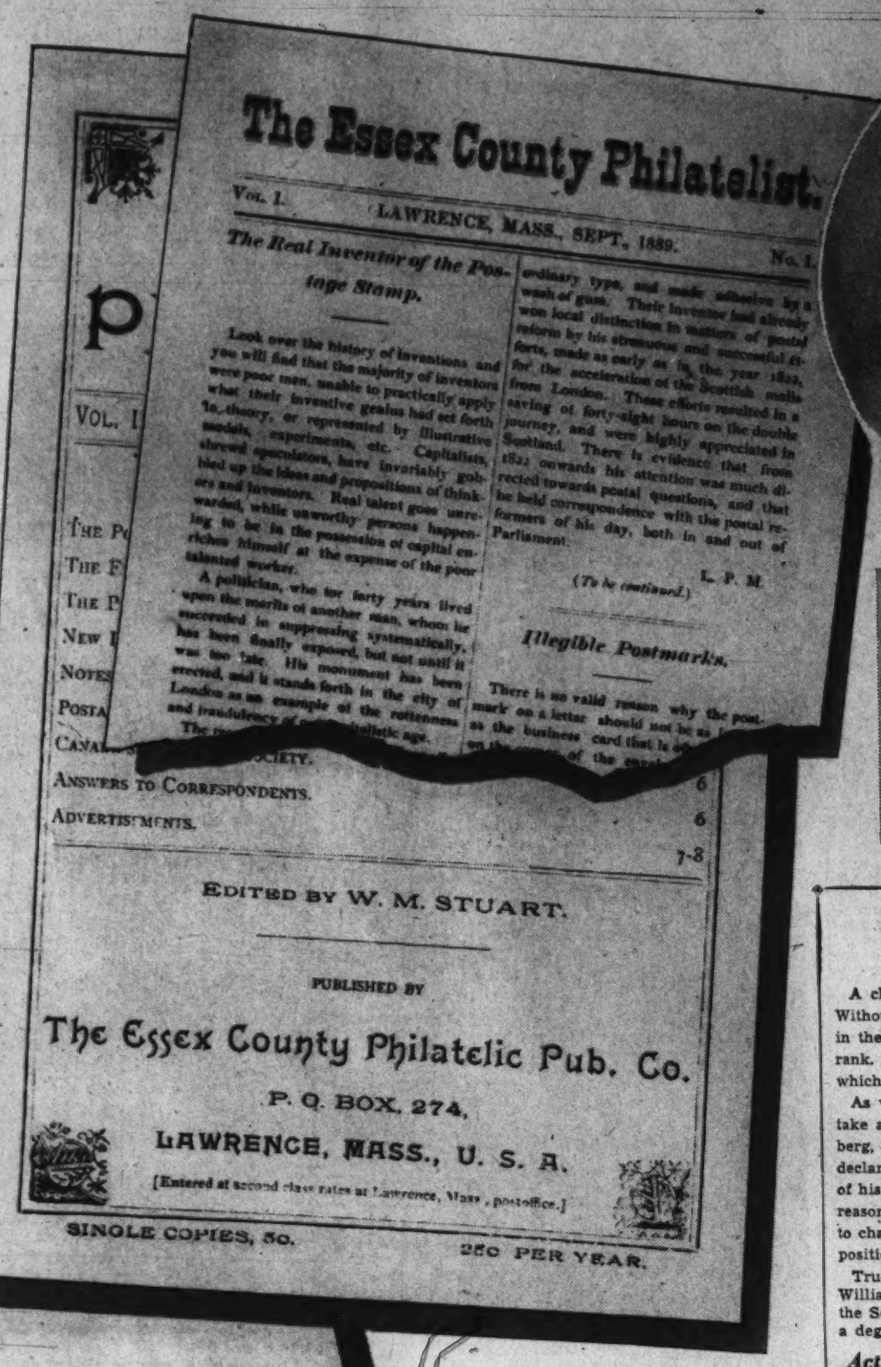
It is perhaps too much to expect that such a code will obtain throughout and without individual violations on both sides. Once the bars are let down, anything may go, in a rough and tumble of challenge, retaliation and stretch sessions that the Senate knows well how to mix.

But for the moment there is an unnatural calm over Senate waters and the Congressional Record is ominously slim. Decorum has all but become a word that has meaning, and Webster's adherents are seeking some mysterious significance in that traditional misnomer—Senatorial courtesy.

Yet there is another tradition, with or without foundation, which may bob up to smack the new Queensberry regime a dirty foul—that the Senate is the most deliberative body in the world!

William M. Stuart Celebrates 50th Anniversary as Philatelic Writer





William M. Stuart, Stamp Editor of The Washington Post, began his career of writing about stamps and stamp collectors in the Essex County Philatelist, Lawrence, Mass., in 1889. Today he celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of the appearance of his first article. At the left is reproduced a copy of his first paper. Immediately below is a congratulatory letter from Postmaster General Farley. Stuart is pictured (left) as he is today, (above) as he looked in 1889.

WashingtonPhilatelist Turned His Hobby Of Stamp Collecting Into a Career

By Scott Hart

William M. Stuart, stamp editor of The Washington Post, today celebrates his fiftieth anniversary as a philatelic writer, receives encomiums from collectors Nation-wide, declares that the hobby will keep anyone young, and looks to tomorrow when his typewriter will hammer out again the word of new issues the Postoffice Department may have up its sleeve.

Stuart is a familiar figure on the streets of Washington where, with brief case in hand, he has worn away uncountable shoesoles between the Postoffice Department and those charmed places of meeting by night of the stamp collectors. So he walks here, in the hub-bub of Capital activity, spry, quick-eyed and with brisk talk, keeping young, as he says, in his hobby.

He was too much engaged over the Famous American Series, about to appear, for much introspection yesterday, the anniversary eve But from his writing, are seen that as long ago as 1877, when Stuart was a grammar school student in his native Lawrence, Mass., stamps were his big enthusiasm. The hobby then was a child's enterprise. Grownups ventured in with admonitions against anyone making a public notice of it.

Founded Local Clubs

So it was the young Stuart who largely established the children's clubs in Lawrence, who spread his own enthusiasm to many of his elders, who accepted the lure of stamps when New England's snowballing, sleigh riding and ice skating might have sidetracked him.

This hobby wherein he pioneered was something bound to grow, he knew. The "Penny Black" of Great Britain and the 1847 American issues were already being talked about by children in many parts of the country and by those grownups unafraid to venture in. And he found his reputation enlarging in Lawrence.

He had been in a somewhat favored position there. His family had friends and relatives in England and Japan who sent him stamps; and Maj. George S. Merrill, the postmaster whom Lincoln had appointed, was taking him driving in the big carriage, introducing him to important people as "this interesting chap who is fond of stamps and autographs."

There was, too, a large foreign population in Lawrence, who received many interesting stamps and covers from the old countries. Upon these Stuart seized. The years drifted off this beginning. There is no cohesive account.

Stuart was engaged in newspaperpaper work and in politics in Massachusetts. He was secretary and chairman of the Republican City Committee of Lawrence, Mass., for several years at the turn of the century and an associate commissioner of Essex County, Mass., for one term 1901-1904. He was editor of the Lawrence, Mass., American, the Lawrence Sun and Lawrence Telegram at various periods and, in 1904, was on the Boston Record and Advertiser. He left the Record in 1905 to come to Washington to take an appointment in the secretary's office of the United States Senate at the invitation of Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, during the Administration of President Theodore Roosevelt. During the Administration of President Taft and a part of the Wilson Administration he was assistant journal clerk of the United States Senate.

Leaving the secretary's office of the Senate he was for several years connected with the offices of Senators Lodge, Winthrop Murray Crane and John W. Weeks, and Representative Augustus P. Gardner, of Massachusetts. Later he was connected with the Republican National Committee and Massachusetts Republican State Committee. During the Administration of President Hoover he supervised the clipping bureau for the President's personal use. During the World War he served as a representative of the Massachusetts troops in the forces at the front by supplying an agency in the Massachusetts State House with news of soldiers in the field.

Issued First Stamp Paper in 1889

During these years in Washington and in Massachusetts he always kept up his writings about stamps and when Eugene Meyer became publisher of The Washington Post Stuart was named its stamp editor.

But the early years were the difficult ones. Today the hobby counts some 10,000,000 followers, nationally. And it is of the pioneering that Stuart now likes to think.

When he issued the first number of his stamp paper, The Essex County Philatelist, from his home city of Lawrence in September, 1889, "my classmates laughed at such a venture." But the young New Englander realized that the path of any pioneer is tough. And the point is that the paper flourished, and soon he began writing more nationally of the spreading hobby.

"A newspaperman by profession, I found it rather difficult and embarrassing at times to have my editors warn me against publishing any of this 'stamp stuff.' They thought there was no room for such childish articles in the daily press. And it has taken half a century to establish firmly the field of philately in the press of the world," Stuart reminisced yesterday.

He estimates that at least 1,000 publications, daily, Sunday and weekly, magazines and other publications, devote some space to philately and news of postage stamps.

"It is now more than a hobby; it is a study of intricate methods in manufacture of postage stamps—so much so that professional men and women the world over are devoted to philately as something worthwhile," he said.

In the first issue of the Essex County Philatelist, was an article titled, "The Real Inventor of the Postage Stamp," wherein credit was given to James Chalmers, of Dundee, Scotland, who in August, 1834, printed some experimental stamps with the adhesive wash of gum on the back. In that day, England was going through a series of postal reforms; and while Chalmers' efforts did not prevail he still was to be placed in the period of postal reform.

"In 1889 and later years, there ensued a spirited contest among philatelic writers as to the real inventor of the stamp and the credit was after all given to Rowland Hill, a noted British postal reformer. This contest was of importance because it gave many of the school boys a chance to hear themselves talk and our meetings were enlivened."

Hill Later Received Credit

Since then, Sir Rowland Hill became the inventor of the postage stamp and a series of articles in Stuart's journal over a period of several months allowed the Englishman full credit.

There was a touch of New England in Stuart's first editorial, 50 years ago today: "With this number we commence to publish the Essex County Philatelist. We come, as many philatelic papers do, hardly noticed. As a new paper we propose to work up near to the upper round without giving premiums, as we think our paper is worth more than a mere card. We shall in time increase the size of our paper and perhaps the price."

The paper was published in Portland, Me., by W. W. Jewett, who with his son publishes Mekeel's Weekly Stamp News, now edited by Willard O. Wylie, of Beverly, Mass., a friend of Stuart's all these years.

Today, the complaint of the average stamp and cover collecter is poor cancellations, one of long standing. In that first issue, Stuart wrote on "illegible postmarks," all the while cognizant of a growing hobby. Stamp papers were coming and passing almost in a night. There were the Stamp Advertiser, the Fitchburg Philatelist, the Beacon, the Quaker City Philatelist, the Eastern Press, the Philatelic Tribune and the Philatelic Era. The American Philatelist was a good journal in its early years as an official organ of the American Philatelic Society it has prospered for more than a half a century, Stuart points out.

But the matter of good cancellations raged among the collectors for some time. In the November, 1889, issue of Stuart's paper, a correspondent approved of the better cancellations drive, declaring that the Boston postoffice was doing the best cancellations in the country. The reason for this was seen in the installation of 14 machines for postmarking and canceling mail. These machines, capable of turning out 126,000 pieces of mail matter an hour soon had the philatelists a-buzz.

Then came the nickel-in-the-slot machines for all sorts of wares, followed by a stamp vending machine, allowing for a quarter 12 two-cent stamps and a one-cent stamp. Stuart wrote:

"If this invention meets with favor its use will soon become well nigh universal, as both Government and individuals will be benefited by it. The amount of labor on the part of postoffice clerks which will be obviated by it is inestimable, while all humanity will draw a long breath of relief while thinking that the long periods of waiting for stamps before a crowded window or locked office are over."

At this juncture the worth-while-ness of philately was dawning on many and Stuart, in November, 1889, wrote:

From a financial standpoint, philately is about the finest, safest, surest and most profitable form of a savings bank on earth. It is sure to be a good investment, for good stamps are constantly increasing in value." Then, at an auction sale in New York City on May 7, 1889, a 4-cent blue British Guiana 1856 sold for $260, while the 1939 list price is from $4,000 to $6,000.

It was in February, 1890, that Stuart organized his first stamp society with himself as secretary-treasurer. Several of the early members still reside in Lawrence and vicinity. The hobby that Stuart, as a youth, spurred along up there, persists strongly.

Organized Postal Card Society

The year 1890 closed on the Journal, with Stuart in the December issue announcing his intention of organizing the Postal Card Society of America.

So far as is known, this was the first such society in the world. It came to being early in 1891, with these officers: President, George H. Watson, New York; vice president, August Dejonge, New York; treasurer, Adolph Lohmeyer, Baltimore; secretary, William M. Stuart, and official organ, The Essex County Philatelist.

Today Stuart is an honorary life member of the Society of Philatelic Americans; a member of the American Philatelic Society, American Air Mail Society of which he is vice president; Collectors Club, Branch 5, S. P. A., of Washington, Washington Air Mail Society, Pioneer Philateli Phalana, being an honorary life member; the Philatelic Journalists of America, Capital Precancel Club, honorory life member; Cicero-Berwyn Philatelic Society of Illinois, Universal Stamp Association, Baltimore (Md.) Precancel Club, and Precancel Stamp Society.

Says Collectors Haven't Changed

It appears that collectors haven't changed much.

"They were finding fault with the condition of United States in 1891 just as they are today," says Stuart, referring to the March issue of his old Philatelist: "The present 2-cent stamps are very poor. The color comes off, the cancellation can be removed and a stamp can be taken from an envelope and stuck on again. It would not be out of place to have such stamps embossed."

So with this counseling, sustained effort for philately, the sequence moves to Stuart's early membership in the American Philatelic Association. He found occasion to write in March, 1891: "The philatelic world is at last at peace. No personal battles are being fought. All A. P. A. members seem to be busily engaged attending to their own business and not that of their neighbors. The large magazines are more strictly philatelic than before, and all personal items are excluded from them. Let this peace remain and let none indulge in political philately, as it is not only hurtful to one party but to all."

Out of such representative episodes, actions, hopes, despairs and exhortations philately rides high in America. That is the joy, upon this anniversary occasion of William M. Stuart, who may be termed a philatelic founding father, and one who promises to carry on with the hobby into its bigger days.

Mark Sullivan

A change has taken place in the Republican Presidential situation. Without any change in the relative capacity of the three men who lead in the Republican race, a difference has taken place in their relative rank. This has come about through one of those unforeseen conditions which often change political history.

As war in Europe began to affect us, as Congress was called on to take action about our neutrality measure, Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, of Michigan, stepped out in front. He made a clear, unequivocal declaration against change of the neutrality measure. By the strength of his statement, by his earliness in making it (and also, of course, by reason of his ability), Mr. Vandenberg became a leader of the opposition to change. To the country he became a Republican symbol of the opposition.

True, other Republican Senators take the same attitude, notably Mr. William E. Borah, of Idaho, and Mr. Hiram Johnson, of California. In the Senate debates these may be leaders of the opposition to as great a degree as Senator Vandenberg.

Active in Senate Fight

But the point is, Mr. Vandenberg is one of the Republican Presidential possibilities. And Mr. Vandenberg is the only one of the three leading the race who is conspicuous in opposition to change of the neutrality measure. One of the others, Senator Robert A. Taft, favors change. The third, Mr. Thomas E. Dewey, is not on record. And even if Mr. Dewey opposes change as strongly as Mr. Vandenberg does, Mr. Dewey is not in the Senate nor in any other forum. Mr. Vandenberg, active in the Senate fight, will impress himself on the country as a Republican Presidential possibility who strongly opposes change of the neutrality law.

This makes a change in Vandenberg's rank in the race for the Republican nomination. For the moment it is a change upward. Whether it continues to be a change upward, the whole question of the value to Mr. Vandenberg of this development depends on what happens between now and the Republican National Convention next June. If American sentiment continues to be as strongly away from war as it now is, then Mr. Vandenberg will continue to be favored. If sentiment moves toward participation in the war, as it did during the period up to our entrance into the World War, Mr. Vandenberg will not be favored.

Stresses Domestic Issues

Senator Vandenberg's present position was taken on the immediate question at issue, whether Congress should change our neutrality law as President Roosevelt asked. But the manner in which Mr. Vandenberg took this position made it seem he was opposing with great vigor anything and everything that might tend to draw America closer to the war; that he was insisting, in a deliberately striking way, upon keeping the European war at ocean's length. To this Senator Vandenberg added emphasis upon American domestic issues as more important than any issue arising out of war.

Mr. Vandenberg did not take the position that he would describe as "isolation." He might resent being called an isolationist. Yet the force and manner of this statement were such as to cause the public to think of him as being in the extreme out-of-Europe position.

After Senator Vandenberg made his statement on the neutrality issue and after that issue came under discussion in Congress it became apparent that the Republicans prevailingly are going to stand on this neutrality issue in much the same position as the Michigan Senator.

The Republican Senators generally, with a few exceptions, seem intending to oppose change of the act, and so seem the Republicans in the House.

War and the Convention

So here we have the Republicans apparently about to crystallize into a position on a highly controversial public question. And here we see Senator Vandenberg taking the same position. We see him as the outstanding one of the Republican Presidential possibilities who takes this position aggressively, who is so situated as to be able to take leadership of this position, and who is very ready to take leadership.

Now look forward to the Republican National Convention next June as, no doubt, Mr. Vandenberg is looking forward. In that convention, other things being equal, the Republicans are hardly likely to deny their Presidential nomination to that one of their possibilities who is outstanding in leadership of the party's position. All this is, of course, contingent on the war in Europe continuing and on the American people continuing to feel about it as a majority of them apparently now do. By next June the country may have shifted in feeling and, conceivably, Senator Vandenberg's present position may be a handicap to him. What has been said so far is about the contest for the Republican nomination. There is interest also in the effect of the way on the contest next year between the Republican and Democratic parties.

An Out-of-the War Party

President Roosevelt, in his address to Congress last week, spoke as strongly in favor of America staying out of the war as any one could. It would be quite impossible to say that, as respects staying out of the war, there is any difference between the ardor Mr. Roosevelt expressed and the ardor of any Republican or anybody else.

Yet, as time goes on, it is the Republicans, more than Mr. Roosevelt or the Democrats or the New Deal, who are likely to seem the out-of-war party. That the Republicans should have this position is largely an accident.

The situation of Mr. Roosevelt and the Democrats is that they are in power; they have responsibility. From time to time, as the war develops in Europe, Mr. Roosevelt and the Democrats must take action. Such action as they take or propose may be as strongly in the stay-out-of-war direction as anything that anybody could propose. Yet any action at all runs risk of being interpreted, by some of the voters at least, as being action in the direction of war.

Today it seems destined that the Republicans are likely to have, largely by accident, the out-of-war position. Today that position is an advantage. But today is a short and fleeting moment. Who can tell whether 13 months from now there will be a war; how Americans will feel about the war at that time; what infinite variety of unforeseen conditions may arise in Europe and here.

Nations of New World Strive to Formulate a United Neutrality Policy

War Strengthens Pan-American Ties

First Pan-American Conference Held in Panama 100 Years Ago; Today's Delegates Meet in Same Building

By Joseph Reed.

Neutrality is in the air—national and hemispherical. Solidarity is its echo.

While Congress debates neutrality on Capitol Hill, the nations of the New World debate it in Panama City. As the impact of external strife upon a country tends to generate national solidarity, so does that impact upon a hemisphere tend to generate continental solidarity. The danger of foreign involvement, both nationally and hemispherically, demands action—not impulsive, but deliberate, reasonable, and, above all, rational action.

It is in this latter spirit that the "Conference of Foreign Ministers of the American Republics" is meeting in that historic city which has the honor of having been chosen by Simon Bolivar, "the Great Liberator," as the place for the meeting of the first Inter-American Conference ever a century ago.

That such a conference, representing 21 nations, is possible in the midst of world strife is not only a compliment to the quality of New World statesmanship, but is a tribute to the Pan-American forethought that went into the creation of international machinery which can be set in motion the minute an emergency arises, and begin operations in an orderly manner.

At the beginning of the last World War no such machinery existed. Lack of co-ordination of effort in behalf of neutrality was the penalty. Out of that war, however, came a determination on the part of the nations of the New World to utilize every instrumentality available which would, as far as humanly possible, insulate them against a future world conflict.

To provide this machinery many years of co-operative work has been required. Because of the fear of impingement upon the sovereignty of individual nations of the New World, the task has not been an easy one. There had to be developed a philosophy of mutual respect, a recognition of rights and duties of individual states, and a cessation of intervention on the part of the strong to rectify the internal affairs of the weak. Furthermore, there had to be developed a spirit of co-operation and a consciousness of solidarity of purpose and action. The Latin and Anglo-Saxon mind had to learn how to canalize their thinking, as well as to co-ordinate their endeavors. Unity had to triumph over national prejudices.

That great progress to this end has been made was shown by Secretary Hull in his address on Pan American Day at the New York World's Fair when he asserted that "all this is the fruit of our persistent endeavors to give form and substance to the ideals which we profess. We have striven for years to remove causes of distrust and friction between and among our several countries . . . We have had to overcome false pride and to correct errors. Much of this has been done; and the doing of it has established faith and trust among American nations."

A Result of Declaration of Lima

The calling of the present conference by the foreign minister of Panama is the direct result of conventions agreed upon at Montevideo in '33, Buenos Aires in '36, and Lima in '38, and especially in virture of the so-called "Declaration of Lima." In this declaration, after reaffirming continental solidarity and the purpose "to collaborate in the maintenance of the principles upon which the said solidarity is based," the American republics assert that "in any case the peace, security or territorial integrity is threatened by act of any nature that may impair them they proclaim their common concern and their determination to make effective their solidarity, co-ordinating their respective sovereign wills by means of the procedure of consultation, and that in order to facilitate the consultations established in this and other American peace instruments, the ministers of foreign affairs of the American republics when deemed desirable and at the initiative of any of them will meet in their several capitals by rotation and without protocolary character. Each government may, under special circumstances or special reasons, designate a representative as a substitute for its minister of foreign affairs."

In this declaration three points should be emphasized: First, when the security of any one of the American republics is threatened, that situation becomes the immediate concern of all; secondly, that the call for a joint consultation may be made on the initiative of any minister of foreign affairs, and thirdly, that the conference thus called is limited to consultation and a possible statement of uniform foreign policy.

It should be further noted that a conference such as the present one does not enjoy the same official status as that of the so-called regular Pan American Conferences, for to accept an invitation and to participate in the regular conference certain formalities have to be met, because out of these conferences come treaties and conventions which are not only signed but have to be ratified by the legislatures of the several nations involved. Furthermore, participation in a regular conference is predicated, not upon executive action alone, but also upon legislative confirmation.

Therefore the present conference of ministers can only ascertain the foreign policy of the states concerned and through discussion attempt to unify it for the good of the whole. Even then it does not necessarily follow that the resultant unified policy will be followed by all the states represented, for a change in government in any one of them after the concerted policy has been enunciated might conceivably be objected to on the part of a new executive in any one of the several states. For this reason, it will be essential that the present conference predicate its decisions upon well-established principles of international law, and especially those principles which have already been accepted by the American republics and made a part of their national law.

Welles Outlines Reasons for Session

The present conference was called by the foreign minister of Panama. At its first plenary session held on September 25, Sumner Welles, Undersecretary of State representing Secretary Hull, set forth the reason for the call of the conference in these words: "I venture to assert that the government of every American republic coincides in the opinion that the outbreak of the general war with which the world today is confronted constitutes in very truth a potential menace to the well being, to the security, and to the peace of the New World. And it is for this reason that we are meeting here in this historic City of Panama."

As to how this menace was to be met, Mr. Welles stated that it was the desire on the part of the Government of the United States "to take under consideration the complicated question of our rights and duties as neutrals . . . with a view to the preservation of the peace of our respective nations, and with a view toward obtaining complete respect on the part of all belligerents for our respective sovereignties. It would seem to me desirable, so far as conditions and our untrammeled rights of individual action make it possible, for us to give some thought to the desirability of our reaching some uniform standards of approach with regard to the steps which we may individually take in determining and in asserting our rights and obligations as neutrals."

The conference has before it the program approved by the governing board of the Pan American Union. It is divided in three categories. The first is neutrality, and under this head four steps are suggested: (1) suppression of violation of neutrality in common or individually; (2) enforcement of obligations of belligerent war and merchant vessels and aircraft in neutral territory; (3) safeguarding legitimate international trade, commerce and communications of the American republics, and (4) the discharge of neutral obligations toward belligerents.

On the basis of this agenda the first question to arise is this: What are the rights and duties of neutrals?

In the neutrality proclamations issued by the several American republics the principles enunciated by the Second International Peace Conference at The Hague in 1907 form the basis of these proclamations and is so stipulated therein. Parenthetically, this conference was initiated by President Theodore Roosevelt and convoked by the Czar of Russia. The representatives of Germany were the first signators to most of the conventions drafted thereat.

In the convention of the Hague Conference of 1907 "Concerning the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers in Naval Warfare" (which convention particularly applies to the present situation) are 29 articles. The most important of them have to do with action by belligerents in neutral or territorial waters, such as the use of a neutral port as a base of operations by the belligerents, the search and seizure of ships by belligerents in territorial waters, supplying belligerent war vessels with "war material of any kind," the limitation of the stay of a war vessel in the port of a neutral to 24 hours, the call at a neutral port for bunkers or victuals on the "basis of a peace standard," and the lapse of 24 hours for the departure of a belligerent war vessel following that of an enemy merchant ship. The enabling clause reads: "A neutral power is bound to exercise such surveillance as the means at its disposal to prevent any violations of these provisions."

The terms of this convention are a definite part of any country which ratifies or adheres to them. Since the foregoing convention has been adhered to by the United States, as well as some 17 other American republics, and since as far as the United States is concerned under the "law of the land" clause of the United States Constitution it has become a part of our national law, and has been so acknowledged by the Supreme Court, as for example in the "Appam Case," there is no reason to presume that the provisions of this convention cannot now be enforced in the effort to preserve neutrality.

Methods of Enforcement

The next question which arises under this agenda is: What is the best method of enforcing these neutrality provisions? Can it be done best by individual nations of the Americans, or by concerted action?

In considering this question from the viewpoint of concerted action the conference of ministers in Panama City have been discussing chiefly the extension of the present territorial waters as defined by international law. Some of the ministers have suggested its extension to 300 miles; some more, some less. Mr. Welles has proposed that "a safety zone" around the Americas be determined upon and belligerent acts be prevented therein by joint naval patrol.

The generally accepted zone is the so-called "3-mile limit" which originated with the noted Dutch publicist, Bynkershoek, who in 1702, defined such a zone as a strip of water bounding the coast of a state and extending out from the coast "as far as cannon will carry." In his day this distance was 3 miles, hence the above expression.

There have been exceptions to the 3-mile limit, or "marginal sea." In 1917 this area or zone was extended by the United States to a "defensive area" extending beyond that limit. In 1922 this zone was defined as having four leagues (12 miles) in width by United States statute, but Great Britain objected on the grounds "that his Majesty's government has consistently opposed any extension of the limit of territorial waters." In 1924 she did agree, however, by treaty to allow the United States to search and seize rum-runners "within a distance from the coast that might be traversed by the vessel in one hour."

There is one important exception however, which is generally acknowledged and that is on the basis of the "doctrine or hot pursuit." If a belligerent commits a hostile act in territorial waters of a neutral power, naval vessels of that neutral may pursue the belligerent upon the high seas and there capture it.

The extension of the "marginal sea" beyond a reasonable distance will present many practical difficulties. As was pointed out in an editorial in The Post on September 27 regarding the danger of a great extension of the zone, non-American nations would have a valid right to object.

"Two of the belligerents, Great Britain and France, own rather extensive areas in what may be reasonably considered American waters," the editorial said, "British Honduras is a part of Central America, as British and French Guiana are a part of South America. In addition, the British own Jamaica, Bermuda, Barbados, Trinidad and many other islands in the Carribean and west Atlantic. France owns Martinique, Guadelope and other islands."

Besides these, there are the Falkland Islands off the southern coast of the Argentine under British sovereignty, and there is the Straits of Magellan which present still another difficulty. The safety zone which the Americas demand will have to be reciprocally granted to other nations more nearly concerned, and in this case an overlapping of "marginal seas" between belligerents and neutrals will result.

A second point concerning neutral waters advanced by the United States is that of imposing "a ban on belligerent submarines in the ports of the American Republics." This is reasonable and should entail no practical difficulties in its execution.

Now as to violations of neutrality on land, that is, within the territorial confines of the Americas. This concerns one of the points stipulated in the suggestions made by the United States to the conference, namely, "the suppression of 'subversive activities' and activities involving neutrality." This point is likewise covered by the Hague convention of 1907 in these words: "A person cannot avail himself of his neutrality (1) if he commits hostile acts against a belligerent, and (2) if he commits acts in favor of a belligerent."

Steps in this direction have already been taken by several of the American republics, and their acts will pave the way for concerted action. Press dispatches indicate that Colombia has already commenced the necessary negotiations to remove 20 German pilots on the Scadta Line in that country. These pilots are said to be German reserve officers. The Nicaraguan government has dismantled a German radio station in a drugstore in Managua. Mexico is looking for a German radio station which she can hear but cannot find. Costa Rica has dismantled the radio of the German shark fishing boat Stella, sister boat of the Ecuator that was caught "photographing maneuvers of the United States fleet in the Atlantic last January." The native pilots of the Stella asserted that the sharks caught in the daytime were thrown overboard at night, and while the pilots were locked in a room at night they could hear heavy cargo being unloaded on the coast. And so on.

Trade Readjustments Will Be Necessary

The third category of the conference agenda concerns economic questions arising from the present world situation. With trade between the American republics and Europe now practically interdicted as a result of blockade it is obvious that a readjustment of trade between the nations of the New World to compensate for the loss of transatlantic trade will be necessary.

But here, too, a difficult problem presents itself. In the first place it is not clear to the agricultural interests of the United States that trade between this Nation and Latin-American countries will be beneficial to them. This is the objection which has been made to the Hull reciprocal trade treaties as far as the South American countries are concerned. In the second place, from the Latin-American point of view, European markets have been their best outlet because the industrial nations of Europe better complement the agricultural economy of the South American states, especially Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil.

These readjustments in trade cannot be made on an artificial basis, nor in haste. It is for this reason, no doubt, that the United States proposed to the conference that an "inter-American advisory commission" be created to study the commercial readjustment, a fact in itself that indicates the need for extended time.

As far as American industry is concerned it should be noted that this group has not been altogether unmindful of trade opportunities in Latin America. For instance, it is understood that ever since the first World War credit agencies have been setting up machinery to gather financial information of South American buyers so that when the opportunity presented itself American exporters would be able to have on hand responsible credit information and thus obviate the losses heretofore sustained. Then, too, there has been made a study of sales methods required to build up this inter-American commerce. Making sales in Latin America needs an entirely different sales technique than that used in the United States.

According to a study of New World trade made by the National Economic and Social Planning Association two things have been noted: (1) That American business concerns have been working for many years on long-term planning with respect to Latin American commerce, and (2) that from the investment standpoint investments can be made in Latin America with a good margin of safety in assisting Latin Americans in the establishment of manufacturing plants there which could use their own raw materials. These manufactured materials would not necessarily compete with American manufactured products, because they would not be highly specialized products, as for example the automobile or electric refrigerator. This plan is somewhat analagous to the idea of developing in our own southland manufacturing plants which could use the raw materials of the south.

German Deals Not Completed

On the other side of the picture those Latin American states which had barter agreements with Germany now find that the only thing they have is German credits which cannot be used in trade with any other country. Furthermore, Germany had obligated herself to build certain industrial plants in exchange for raw materials. And now those plants will have to be completed by other means, in spite of the fact that the raw materials have already been shipped to Germany. Two examples of such plants which were to be built by Germany are the oil-refining plant in Bolivia, and the great hydroelectric plant on the Rio River in Uruguay.

Furthermore, the Latin Americans claim that Germany has shipped them manufactured products of inferior quality, especially steel products. Of course, it is natural that Germany under a wartime economy would keep at home the best quality products and export the inferior.

Foreign exchange is another problem to be considered. Mr. Welles suggested that a commission be established to study any problems of monetary relationships, foreign exchange, and the management or balance of payment." Several of the Latin-American countries have already taken action to protect their respective foreign exchanges. Since the British pound-sterling is so well established in that area as a medium of exchange, some definite plan of stabilization is highly essential.

There is also the problem of the rerouting of shipping lines from European ports to Latin-American ports. Shipping routes cannot be changed officially. Ships must have cargo. Cargo must be made available, and the demand for commodities between nations created. This, at best, is a long-time process. There is no use in establishing a line of ships between two ports unless there is in the offing sufficient business to justify their operation. The United States Shipping Board, in their post-war efforts to create new trade routes, learned this sad lesson much to its regret and that of the American taxpayer.

Finally, there is the problem of tariff. Mr. Welles has asked for "the preservation of trade and liberal commercial policies by the American republics." Press dispatches from Panama reveal the suggestion of a "tariff truce." But it will be difficult for the American republics to maintains their present tariff structure in the face of potential losses from export trade, unless the internal revenue structure be adjusted to compensate these losses. The new budget of Argentina already reflects this situation. Internal taxes are to be increased to offset the decrement in customs.

Serious Problems Being Considered

Herewith will be seen some of the serious problems which the foreign ministers at Panama City are considering. That they will be able to evolve a uniform policy will depend upon:

(1) How far the American republics will work on a give-and-take basis;

(2) What the reaction of the belligerents will be with regard to the extension of the present well-accepted "3-mile limit" as is contemplated in the proposed "safety zone;" and,

(3) How far the American republics will respond to the requisite re-adjustments in inter-American trade policies.

Unfortunately, this is a "rush order." Time is the essence of its workable fulfillment.

Conference Meets In Historic City

Efficient Co-operation Possible Today Because of Long Years of Groundwork

Kaiser Wilhelm Today

orchestral drum, Hermine told me the story that lay back of the scene we were viewing. And as she talked the hands of time whirled in reverse to that eventful day in November, 1918, when Wilhelm von Hohenzollern stepped from the special train that had rushed him across the Dutch-Belgian frontier, handed his sword to an amazed Dutch sentry, and became a guest of Count Godark Bentinck, who as an hereditary Knight of St. John, had offered a safe haven in accordance with his vow to help a brother knight in adversity.

Life was serene at Count Godard's ancient, moated castle in Amerongen—too suddenly serene for a man who had just emerged from the throbbing torrent of a losing war. The Kaiser no longer cared to hunt or play cards. Talk, which once was a favorite form of relaxation, became now, a nightmare of post-mortems.

Back in Berlin, when he was sorely troubled, the Kaiser had paced the gallery of his palace, hands folded behind his back, head thrust forward, taking comfort from the ancestral Hohenzollerns who looked down from portraits on the wall. There was no palace gallery to bring him surcease now. He must find something else. He must!

One morning the Kaiser strode into the yard of the castle, picked up an ax that lay beside a chopping block and began to swing it lustily. As long as he remained at Amerongen, he kept Count Godard's stoves in wood-block fuel. And now, at Doorn, far from battle lines that weave across war torn Europe, the boom of the former Emperor's ax resounds each day through the quiet gardens.

Chapter III

KAISERIN HERMINE and I were resting in her sunny, comfortable sitting-room after a long walk through the House Doorn gardens. For a few minutes we talked—the chatty, inconsequential talk of two women discussing their households and their children—and then we both fell silent.

I needed no telepathic powers to know that she too, in those quiet minutes, was re-living an era now gone by. Youthful days in the Berlin of 20 years ago where we had first become friends—when the Kaiserin was still the lovely Princess Hermine, and I the young wife of an American newspaperman assigned to the German capital.

Many strange and unexpected things had happened since that time, not the least of which was the fact that the silent, middle-aged woman relaxing there before me in her mahogany and damask chair was now the Kaiserin Hermine. For her marriage to Wilhelm the Second had been like a chapter out of a romantic novel; one of those entertaining books which moves the reader to murmur knowingly:

"How nice, but those things never happen in real life."

At Doorn, in 1921, Empress Auguste Viktoria, the Kaiser's first wife, had died and he spent a lonely, sorrowful winter in his Dutch retreat. Members of the royal family visited him from time to time, but the former Emperor sorely felt the lack of the companionship that he had so depended on. As it developed, a remarkable and heartening romance was near.

Hermine Adored Her Emperor

German schoolgirls in the nineties looked with worshipful eyes at their youthful Kaiser, cherished his photograph, sent him bouquets of flowers. Like the rest, tiny Princess Hermine, of Reuss, a distant cousin, adored her Emperor.

The years slipped by, and she married Prince Schonaich-Carolath. Then, in 1922, when she was a widow with four children, one of her little sons was deeply touched by her account of the lonely life of their formed Emperor in his far-off castle at Doorn.

"Mother," the lad said, "I would like to write the Kaiser a letter. I would like to tell him that we think of him often. May I?"

The Princess gave her consent, and in a childish scrawl, the boy laboriously spelled out a letter of loyalty to the exile at Doorn. Soon there came a reply.

"I would like to see your little son," the former Kaiser wrote. "Won't you bring him to visit me?"

Princess Hermine was hesitant to take her children to the castle. She had heard the legends and rumors that buzzed through Germany and the rest of the world—that the former Kaiser was wrapped in deep melancholy, that the awful strain of the war years had tipped the delicate balance of his mind. Nevertheless, they made the journey.

It was a case of love at first sight. A few months later came the announcement of their engagement. On November 5, 1922, they were married in a simple ceremony at Doorn.

A servant pattered down the hallway past the open door of the Kaiserin's sitting room, and his presence snapped the thread that tied us to the past. Hermine turned away from the window.

Railroad Buying

The rapid rise in carloadings and the prospect of further increases ahead have caused the railroads to speed up orders for new equipment at a surprisingly rapid rate. In the last six weeks, indeed, these new equipment orders have exceeded $150,000,000—the largest total for such a limited period since 1929.

It is believed that a threatened shortage of freight cars accounts for the spectacularly heavy increases in car orders during the past month. Buying has not been confined to cars, however. Fifty orders have been placed for locomotives since mid-August compared with only four in July and five in September a year ago. Orders for rails are likewise piling up, while repair work on old stock is being rushed.

The belief that car shortages will develop this fall as traffic expands is strengthened by the appeal of the roads to shippers to load and unload as rapidly as possible. Despite reassuring statements by the Association of American Railroads, it seems probable that surplus cars have been about used up. The number of freight cars in service was recently reported to be the smallest in over 30 years, while the number of surplus cars was 41 per cent below the average of the preceding five years. As for locomotives, the number in service is the smallest in several decades—only 43,000 as compared with nearly 65,000 in 1924. With due allowance for the interim improvement in performance, the present number of locomotives is considered to be an absolute minimum.

The fact that financially weak and bankrupt roads are participating in equipment buying along with the strong carriers is encouraging evidence of a disposition to meet the challenge of increased traffic by improving facilities for transport. Not only the railway companies and their employes will derive benefit from modernized equipment which cuts operating costs; the rail equipment concerns and the industries from which they buy will also feel the stimulus of the new orders.

The Two-Price System

New York City's largest department store, which has done business on a "cash-only" basis for more than 80 years, has decided to introduce a so-called cash-time service system—another name for installment selling. The customer who buys on time, however, will have to pay a service charge to cover the cost of the credit operation. In other words, the store is really introducing a two-price system in contrast to the general practice of such establishments.

This departure is in line with suggestions recently made in a study of distributive costs prepared for the Twentieth Century Fund. The fund's investigators estimated that 59 cents of the consumer's dollar goes to pay for distributive services, leaving only 41 cents to cover production costs. Since there is no evidence that the profits of concerns engaged in distributing goods are generally excessive, it follows that a reduction in these high distributive outlays can be effected only through more efficient conduct of business and elimination of some of the services performed for customers.

Under the usual one-price system prevailing in retail stores having both cash and charge customers, the buyer for cash who takes his purchases away himself must pay for credit and delivery services of which he does not avail himself. If such customers were given the benefit of lower prices, fewer demands for special services would be made, and the costs of retail distribution would decline correspondingly.

There are, of course, a good many difficulties in the way of establishing differentiated retail pricing systems. Generally speaking, in fact, it would be impracticable for an isolated retail establishment to vary its charges to customers, except by agreement with competitors. The New York department store that is preparing to experiment with a two-price system is not a typical case, because it has long followed a pricing policy at variance with that of its competitors.

The rapid spread of retail selling on credit, through either charge accounts or installment contracts, indicates that this type of accommodation meets a real and growing need. It is too strong a trend to be opposed as socially undesirable, despite obvious abuses. Nevertheless, it should not be unduly encouraged by pricing policies which actually favor the buyer on credit. The cost of consumer credit accommodation comes high and should be avoided whenever there are no compelling reasons for deferred payments. A pricing system that offers a man with cash a direct pecuniary inducement to pay cash helps to keep down total distributive costs and bring about a lower scale of prices without loss to the distributor.

Democracy In Practice

Representative Dies and his committee investigating un-American activities have done some effective work in revealing the relationships between several political groups in this country and their foreign principals. Thanks to his persistence, the American people now have a much better idea of how the Communist Party here is financed and how it operates. The same is true in the case of the German-American Bund. The committee has not, however, evolved a satisfactory answer to the question as to what the future status of these organizations should be.

Mr. Dies seems to be aiming at dissolution of the American Communist Party. The cheers which arose when he mentioned that objective at the conclusion of the hearing on Friday indicate the popularity of such a move. Thousands of citizens resent the freedom with which agents of Moscow operate in this country. That feeling has been greatly intensified by the Hitler-Stalin coup. Moreover, the European war has emphasized the potential danger of harboring in this country groups that may be employed by foreign governments for espionage work.

This distrust of Communism and Nazism, however, should not divert us from the basic principles of democracy. The Constitution guarantees "the right of the people peaceably to assemble." It guarantees freedom of belief, freedom of speech and of the press. Those rights cannot be denied to any group without endangering the most fundamental principles on which democracy rests.

Since Communists as well as Democrats and Republicans are thus protected by the Bill of Rights, it seems futile to talk of outlawing the party to which they belong. If members of that party conspire to overthrow the Government, they can be dealt with under the present law. Leaders of the party who act under instructions from the Communist International at Moscow can doubtless be required to register with the Department of State as agents of a foreign principal. It is not necessary to proscribe any political organization to keep subversive elements in check.

To cope with the menace of foreign propaganda, the committee might recommend to Congress the enactment of a law that would forbid all political parties to accept funds from governments or organizations in other countries. That would force the Nazis and the Communists here to stand on their own feet, without attempting to interfere with their rights to think and preach as they please.

It is likewise reasonable for the Dies Committee to demand membership lists from the Communist Party and the bund. Democracy does not guarantee to minority groups the right to conduct their affairs in secrecy. On the contrary, it frowns upon clandestine activities and encourages the formation of policies through open and frank debate. Along with the liberty to think and speak as we please must go individual repsonsibility before the public for such conduct.

Undoubtedly, publication of Communist and bund membership lists would be embarrassing to some individuals. But democracy offers no guarantee against embarrassment. Having established the rights of free conscience, it assumes that every citizen will have the courage of his own convictions. Since government by the people can succeed only where there is a relatively high degree of enlightenment among the rank and file, that type of government has an obligation to turn the light of publicity upon subversive groups that seek to operate under cover.

The totalitarian method is to crush an organization that appears to be dangerous to the state. The democratic method is to expose the aims and activities of such organizations and to punish individuals guilty of violating the law, without infringing the rights of any minority to organize for the promotion of its cause. Mr. Dies would make a very serious mistake if he should overlook this distinction. Especially in a period of tension, democracy can best be protected by clinging steadfastly to democratic practices.

Her taste exact, For faultless fact
Amounts to a disease.

Thus might Germany recite about her latest correspondent, Guatemala. But there are some very interesting possibilities in the peremptory note recently sent by the little country. Charging he had been misquoted, Dr. Carlos Salazar, foreign minister, asked the German minister to "take necessary steps to insure that German radio stations broadcast only the truth."

If Herr Hitler is as astute as many people think he is, he may reply to Guatemala by asking Pontius Pilate's question: What is truth? In that case Guatemala would probably be stuck. She might suggest that truth has often been identified with beauty or virtue or goodness. But then Germany could point out the danger of broadcasting the virtues, as they might be mistaken for propaganda.

And that, Guatemala should reply, would be quite all right. As Sophocles optimistically said, "the truth is always the strongest argument." But Herr Hitler might turn to an American to help him out at that point in the battle of quotations. It was Thoreau who said "It takes two to speak the truth—one to speak and the other to hear." Dr. Salazar would never agree, of course, that the fault lay with Guatemalan listening instead of Nazi speaking.

So the controversy might go on interminably. Or it might be quickly ended if Dr. Salazar should turn to Mr. George Bernard Shaw. The truth is, as Mr. Shaw observes, that "truth telling is not compatible with the defense of the realm."

On Adjourning Politics

On September 3 President Roosevelt made a plea that "partisanship and selfishness be adjourned; and that national unity be the thought that underlies all others." Last Thursday night John Hamilton, chairman of the Republican National Committee, rejected the idea that "politics ought to be adjourned in the present emergency," and urged that our political system continue to function normally.

Superficially it may appear that the two major parties are clashing over the political strategy to be followed in this country during the European war. Actually, however, a vast number of citizens approve both these statements of policy. And there is not necessarily any conflict between them.

Since the President was speaking of problems that the war has laid at our door, his statement may be regarded as a plea for adjournment of politics in considering issues of peace and neutrality. There is no reason to assume that he wished to silence all political debate in other fields.

Nor does Mr. Hamilton seek to make an issue out of the war or the Administration's attitude toward it. "We are Americans first," he said, "and Republicans second . . . I covet for us an ability to distinguish between good and bad in the performance of the Administration. I covet for us a willingness to cooperate with the good." Mr. Hamilton's chief concern is that the crisis in Europe shall not bring about "an adjournment of politics which would permit a blackout of urgent domestic problems."

Certainly there is not at present any reason for departure from the traditional American two-party system. Even in England Liberal and Labor leaders have declined posts in the cabinet, and are supporting all necessary war measures from their independent positions. Our Government, with its system of checks and balances, is much less susceptible than that of Great Britain to the coalition technique. The President has properly asked Republican as well as Democratic leaders in Congress to remain in Washington after the extra session is adjourned for consultation on vital issues that might arise. But no purpose would be served by asking other Republicans to join the Cabinet.

The object to be sought is harmony between the two parties on foreign policy. To some extent that has already been achieved. In his recent address to Congress President Roosevelt dedicated his Administration to a course of action that "will protect the neutrality, the safety and the integrity of our country and at the same time keep us out of war." Most Republicans have taken the same position, trying only to outdo the President in emphasis. Differences on the arms embargo cut through party lines on both sides.

If a foreign policy satisfactory to the dominant elements in both parties can be achieved, political discussion of domestic issues can be resumed without danger that the country may be weakened through loss of unity. The contest for the Presidency in 1940 cannot be postponed and its importance should not be minimized because Europe is at war. The national interest requires only that our relationship to the war shall not be made a political football.

"Research by a Massachusetts medical college indicates that worry causes rheumatism." We don't know about that, but we do know that rheumatism causes worry.

As many things as there are in this world, we have the strongest kind of feeling that something immensely important is missing.

Another unusual thing about the European war is that the nations engaged in it are fighting it with their own money.

Horoscopes

From the Chicago Daily News.

Red Mars rode across the August heavens every night, escort to pale Diana, as Hitler is said to have communed with his astrologers on his Berchtesgaden hill.

He needed no more moonbeams to make him mad. His star was already found. It, too, was a red star—the five-pointed star of the Soviets.

Napoleon saw a star in the Russian skies. None of his staff could make it out when he pointed upward in the dark on the banks of the Niemen.

The safe rule with Russian stars would seem to be to read them as red lights at the crossroads.

"Hee must have a long spoone, shall eat with the devil."

Pals

Dr. Corwin On Neutrality

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: In going before Congress to urge repeal of the arms embargo, the President undertook an unaccustomed role for him, that of opponent of legal change, of champion of ancient wont and use. The novelty of the part perhaps accounts for his rather unsatisfying performance of it.

Mr. Roosevelt asserts in his opening sentence that the embargo "impairs the peaceful relations of the United States with foreign nations;" and he later adds "his deep and unalterable conviction . . . that by the repeal of the embargo the United States will more probably remain at peace than if the law remains as it stands today."

In support of neither assertion nor conviction, however, does he adduce any proof whatever of either factual or logical nature, except a reference to "years of experience as a worker in international peace," most of which must have antedated his original approval of the embargo.

He finds, to be sure, the distinction which the embargo provision sets up between completed implements of war and the materials out of which they are made an "artificial" one, and he challenges "those who seek to retain the present embargo position" to "be wholly consistent and seek legislation to cut off cloth and copper and meat and wheat and a thousand other articles from all of the nations at war."

But obviously the fact that this distinction is "artificial" would not necessarily make it a source of danger to our relations with other countries, while the appeal to consistency is an argument which can be worked both ways.

Most legal distinctions are artificial, otherwise the law would not have had to intervene to set them up. And the distinction which the President attacks is derived from the very international law which he so much praises and to which he is so anxious to return. What is more, he himself adopts it at the end, when he urges the retention of the present "license system covering import and export of arms, ammunition and implements of war" and the present ban on the shipment of these to belligerent countries on American vessels. Of the latter he says, "this provision should not be disturbed."

Mr. Roosevelt also endeavors to bolster his case by an appeal to history. He seeks to affix to the present embargo the odium which Jefferson's embargo incurred some 130 years ago. Referring to our struggle to keep out of the Napoleonic Wars, he says: "We acted for some years under the so-called embargo and non-intercourse acts. That policy turned out to be a disastrous failure—first, because it brought our own Nation close to ruin, and second, because it was the major cause of bringing us into active participation in European wars in our own War of 1812."

Coming from the present leader of the Democratic Party, this attack on the principal and most obstinately persisted in policy of the party's founder seems an argument of desperation. At least, it will come as news to most students of American history that Jefferson's embargo brought on the War of 1812!

Another argument the President phrases thus: "From a purely material point of view, what is the advantage to us in sending all manner of articles across the ocean for final processing there, when we could give employment to thousands by doing it here? Incidentally, and again from the material point of view, by such employment we automatically aid our own national defense."

The argument is both irrelevant to the main issue and unconvincing in itself. The Congress has recently appropriated some billions of dollars toward this country's re-armament. Is their expenditure to be postponed in order that we may supply the warring European countries with arms, or are the two things to proceed concomitantly? If the latter we shall have on our hands at the end of hostilities a vastly over-developed munitions industry just as we did at the end of the World War, and a second economic collapse of more or less serious character. It is true that this danger would be somewhat mitigated by adoption of the cash and carry plan, although that is entirely without sanction from international law!

Finally, the President advances the following argument: "Repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the crux of this issue. The enactment of the embargo provisions did more than merely reverse our traditional policy. It had the effect of putting land powers on the same footing as naval powers, so far as sea-borne commerce was concerned. A land power which threatened war could thus feel assured in advance that any prospective sea-power antagonist would be weakened through denial of its ancient right to buy anything anywhere.

"This, four years ago, gave a definite advantage to one belligerent as against another, not through his own strength or geographic position, but through an affirmative act of ours. Removal of the embargo is merely reverting to the sounder international practice, and pursuing in time of war as in time of peace our ordinary trade policies."

There is some confusion of statement, possibly of thought here. "Four years ago," when the embargo was enacted there were no belligerents; it was a period of peace, at any rate as respects the land and naval powers to whom the President refers. Can it be conceded, then, that the United States is not free to revise its trade policies in time of peace, whatever the repercussions may be upon the opposed interests of future belligerents? Certainly no such concession can be made unless international law requires it.

The fact is that the above argument rests on a mistaken assumption, namely, that neutrals are under a positive obligation to trade with belligerents. The international law to which the President constantly appeals, knows no such rule. It does require that a neutral shall not prohibit trade with one belligerent which it permits with the other. It also subjects neutral trade to the hazards to which the rules concerning contraband and blockade give rise. But it no more requires a neutral to stand ready to sell to belligerents than it requires a neutral to produce for them. The President's argument subjects neutral interests to an utterly unheard of servitude in favor of belligerents, and in the instance it quite gratuitously presents the naval powers with a grievance made up out of whole cloth.

There may be plenty of sound arguments for the repeal of the arms embargo. If so, the President has been singularly unsuccessful in discovering them. The address to Congress does not make out a case for its main proposal, and shows a disturbing lack of clarity on the part of the Administration as to its own guiding intention.—Edward S. Corwin, Princeton, New Jersey, Sept. 23.

The Lore Of The Dial

AS THE NUMERALS are ostensibly the clue to the hour, minute and second ticked off by the clock or the watch it would naturally be inferred that the user of it would be familiar with those on his own watch, but actually, in reading the time one gives little attention to the numerals—how little may be gathered from an amusing experiment:

When he has looked at his watch (perhaps for the hundredth time that day, and has put it out of sight, it is an old trick to ask him whether the numerals on the dial are Roman or Arabic.

He doesn't know. Under the stimulus of a subconscious memory he hazards a guess and he may sometimes be right, but with the even chance of guessing right or wrong combined with the fact that his memory may be playing him false, he is more likely to be wrong and the laugh is on him, to his chagrin and the amusement of those around him. Before he looks again at the watch if he is asked whether the numerals are erect in position or radial, he is in the same fog as before. Pressed more particularly as to whether the figure for the hour 6 is right side up or inverted he is tempted to make a decision, only to find that his dial has no 6, as it has been cut away by the circle for the seconds hand! Other changes may be rung on the same bell.

IN VIEW of such experiences figures on a dial would seem superfluous. This is not so with a piece that is near enough to come directly under the eye of the observer; it is more nearly the case with one that is at a considerable distance or at great height, as in a tall tower, and accordingly it is principally in monumental clocks that the numerals have been dispensed with. Among notable examples are the clock on the City Hall in Philadelphia, installed in 1899; that of Colgate & Co. in Jersey City, 1924; the famous clock on the Houses of Parliament, London, 1854-59; and that of the Siemens-Halske Electrical Works, Berlin, c. 1925. These are too recent to be considered antique.

Latterly the popular desire for novelty has led clockmaking companies to use patterns that were formerly disapproved, and within the last few years they have produced many small electric clocks with no numerals on the dials. In abandoning numerals the position of the hands was determined by lines or a circle of dots or perhaps (not to ignore ornament altogether) a ring of stars.

The function of dial marking is to facilitate the reading of the hour, minute and sometimes second, so that the reader may catch it at a glance and he that runs may read. To accomplish this the prime requisite is distinctness. Any elaboration that interferes with it is out of place.

Rumored And Reported

THE WOMAN'S HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION was in session indoors and the Old Timers, on the hotel porch, waited for their wives and discussed the war.

Parson Bob deplored the prevalence of rumors which later proved untrue and there were those present who agreed with him. But Casual Smith dissented.

There is no such thing as idle rumor (said he). Rumors are the busiest things alive. And they have their uses. For one thing they teach a man to think—to discriminate. You view them in the light of logic (sometimes) or in the light of sentiment (usually) and end up by believing what you want to believe, which is always comforting and sometimes heartening. And now and then you get your wish.

Even rumors that to the clear-eyed seem utterly groundless very frequently, as Christopher Morley long ago entertainingly pointed out, prove surprisingly to be the harbingers of solid facts. Thus you get advance information of what is happening or is about to happen. Such rumors have been known to spoil surprise parties, solve problems before they are propounded, and precipitate trouble in teacup tempests. And in their larger aspects they both rule or ruin.

The wise man, therefore, discounts rumor, but never wholly ignores it. In many cases it is a tossed penny with an even chance of head or tail. But the odds vary with the character of the rumor. If it is based on a logical probability it is as simple as that two and two make four minus the possibility that the simple arithmetician is not quite sure that he is dealing with two and two. Or the greater possibility, since stories grow in the telling, that the wise man's "may happen" has grown to "will happen" or "has happened."

If the rumor's groundwork is emotional, it may or may not be the product of wishful or fearful thinking, and the man who gives credence to it may experience anything from a total bust to the raking in of a jackpot. And don't make the mistake of belittling the potency of emotional rumor and the consequent occasional rightness of it. Emotion is packed thought, massed thought. All the grievous thoughts in the world are packed into a youngster's sore toe when he stubs it. When all the commonplaces of individual thought are massed in national sentiment they become vibrant and alive. Consider patriotism.

Of course, a man, as an individual, loves his country. It means safety for himself, his home and for those he loves. These are the adequate and cogent reasons, but he does not grow excited over them. They are commonplaces. But massed patriotism! Ah, that is something else again. With the flag as his symbol his heart is stirred and grows tender, his mind is inflamed, and his tongue grows eloquent. Watch out for that man. He'll back his words with deeds.

No. Don't treat too lightly the emotional rumor. Wishes are not only the fathers of thoughts; in statecraft and diplomacy they are very frequently the molder of facts. Many-tongued rumor on a popular sounding board will frequently direct history.

Rumors are born in many other ways, but we need consider only one more: The stories that come under the head of propaganda. Propaganda, in its modern meaning, is, roughly speaking, the stuff turned out by the publicity bureaus of the opposition camps. Some of this sticks fairly well to the truth, but stresses the thing desirable and soft pedals the think unpleasing. Consciously or unconsciously we all do it.

But there is abundant evidence that the "propagandist" is not averse to lying. The deliberate lie is sometimes hard to dissect. The only safe thing is to use plenty of salt and wait for time to furnish proof or disproof.

Some of the lies, happily, furnish their own rebuttal. Nobody, for instance, credited the mean little insinuation that Winston Churchill brought about the sinking of the Athenia "so that sentiment should turn against Germany." Dorothy Thompson disposed of that. It simply wasn't true because Winston Churchill is incapable of any mean, contemptible and dirty little act. You don't have to see eye to eye with the British statesman to believe that much. Men's consciences are birds of a feather that flock together.

But would you be so quick to exonerate Hitler? No. His record is against him. Not even his denial would do any good. A dog with a bad name can't shake it off by wagging his tail. Despite all the kind words said of the skunk it remains in bad odor.

Which brings me to the point I had in mind: Rumor, man created. It is man in his own image and carries with it his character and reputation. But later it may become something very unlike its creator. One must therefore consider its source and trace its travels before believing or disbelieving.

And so I want to continue to hear the rumors. From the clash of biased opposing minds I am more likely to arrive at the whole truth than from a coldly dispassionate summing up of events after they have occurred.

And I could wish that rumor had been busier when The Washington Post editorially, and its commentators on the opposite page, foretold the probability of a union between Hitler and Stalin. Logic and reason speak to smaller audiences than wild-eyed rumor. If rumor had played prophet it might have made a difference in Poland.

"I don't altogether approve of that last remark, Casual," said Parson Bob. "Surely logic and reason are better than hysteria."

"I don't altogether approve of it myself," said Casual Smith. "But there it is."

The League Adopts Neutrality

Geneva.

"ANY WAR or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the League or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole League, and the League shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations." So run the opening sentences of Article II of the Covenant.

In such circumstances, it is provided by the Covenant that the council of the League—or if necessary the Assembly—should immediately meet in special session for purposes of consultation and action.

Today the country of a member of the League (Poland) is being ravaged by the armies of an invader. Hostilities began on September 1, a week before the Council and Assembly of the League were due to meet in regular session.

WERE THOSE meetings speeded up to deal with the emergency? No. Did the Polish government hasten to inform the League of the matter? No; if it had ever thought of doing so, it would have taken this step months ago, presumably, when the threat of war became obvious. Did Poland's allies (the very word 'ally' is foreign to the Geneva vocabulary) exercise their friendly right under Article II "to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends"? Again—no.

On the contrary, the British government notified the secretary-general that it found it impossible to send a delegation to the forthcoming Geneva meetings. The council and assembly were adjourned sine die and the secretary-general declared that a state of emergency existed in which he himself in collaboration with a quorum of the supervisory commission was obliged to assume "a very great and very heavy responsibility." These responsibilities include the authority to dissolve, if necessary, the very League itself, subject to executive approval by a special meeting of his assembly.

Such a drastic step is not, of course, envisaged for the moment. But when Monsieur Avenol says, as he did to his staff on September 5, "A temporary adaptation of our organization will perhaps prove to be inevitable—an adaptation to the volume of work, an adaptation to financial requirements" he is certainly understanding what he has in mind and what will almost certainly be forced upon the League by the logic of events.

WHAT THE LEAGUE might be able to do during wartime in the technical field is unknown. It will depend in part upon the circumstances of the war, and in part upon the imagination and adaptability of those responsible for conducting those services.

So far as any political role is concerned, it would seem that the League has been reduced, for the time being, to nil. At one time there was a plan, favored it is believed by the secretary-general, to remove the League headquarters, in the event of a war in which Germany was the 'aggressor,' to Vichy in the middle of France. Those who advocated such a plan must have been thinking of the possibility that a considerable number of states would have been banded together in open opposition to the 'aggression' and that yet other states would be prepared to go so far as to give at least moral support to such an anti-aggression bloc.

It would be rash to foretell what the course of the war will be. There is only one safe prophecy, namely, that we may expect the unexpected, so that one cannot absolutely rule out the possibility that the League might yet function in the war as an instrument, if not the organ, of an anti-aggression bloc.

Nevertheless, such a development which might have seemed quite feasible if France and England had come to terms with Soviet Russia, has obviously been made much less likely as the nonaggression pact between Germany and Russia.

In the former circumstances it would have been practical politics for the League to have taken sides in the conflict, even if that had meant the secession of a number of states who were determined at all costs to preserve a strict neutrality. But, in the present circumstances, where only three members of the League are allied against Germany, and where the effort to remain neutral, at least in law, is widespread, it is obvious that to move the headquarters of the League to the territory of one of the belligerents would be to dissolve the League.

HENCE, the League remains on Swiss soil; and although the Swiss government is committed to guarantee the free functioning of the organs of the League, it is obvious that, so long as Swiss neutrality be respected by Germany, the idea of major political discussions in Geneva is out of the question.

We have today the strange spectacle of a League in which neutrality was supposed to have been superseded conforming strictly to the exigencies of one small state upon whose territory the League headquarters happen to be situated, and whose neutrality had been restored to it by the League with obvious reluctance. This paradoxical state of affairs was vividly brought home in a communication issued by the secretary-general to his colleagues on September 1, the day of the German attack upon Poland, in which he called their attention to "the need for everyone to conform to the requirements of our life in a neutral country lying between the belligerent states!"

The council and assembly have assumed, for the moment at least, an attitude consistent with that of Switzerland, the most thorough-going neutral amongst League members.

IT MUST not be thought that the writer of this article is assuming that the League is finished; or that it will necessarily have nothing to say and do before the present conflict is over.

No one can foretell what may happen, except that at the end of the war the world will be desperately in need of just those things that the League has all too inadequately provided—a forum for consultation, a health service, an economic intelligence service, an instrument for promoting limitation and reduction of armaments.

Here in Geneva the necessary technical knowledge to do all these and many other things essential in the modern world still exists. In what form that knowledge and experience can be made available is another matter.

In his address to the staff, Monsieur Avenol declares, "I am firmly convinced that the war will rejuvenate and recreate in more imperative form a comprehension of the necessity it (the League) represents for the maintenance of civilization."

I think, perhaps, it is early days to calculate the probable or possible future of the Geneva League. But, as one sees that great building, the Palais des Nations, glistening in the September sunshine, his mind is not only filled with poignant memories and regrets for missed opportunities during the past 20 years, but also with a belief that, despite all shortcomings, the first League of Nations has blazed a new trail which, if followed and extended, will surely lead out of the jungle of international anarchy.

DILEMMA

By L. K. S.

Strong, sane words the Nation praises,
Human minds pronounce them good:
Aid for Right—Defeat for Evil,
Thus has Freedom ever stood.

Yet higher than Reason or human minds are,
Cries a voice that none can still:
"Will you aid in wholesale slaughter?
Christ has said, 'Thou shalt not kill;'"

Then shall we let Evil conquer?
Lift no hand to save the world?
God, is such there be above us,
Why hold now Your banners furled?

Here Today we stand debating—
Questions without number rise.
Prayers to a Power surpassing Congress,
Fill our hearts with anguished cries.

May whatever God we worship
Guide our path this fateful day,
When no man can see the future,
When but One can point the way.

Not this Nation and not this one
Can survive his brother's fall;
No! Mankind must live a unit,
Sharing in a world for all!

How such peace can come we see not,
We must search our hearts to know,
Reach for Power transcending Man's power,
Seek where Living Waters flow!

Russian Aims

Soviet Hegemony Better Than Nazis', Writer Claims

To the Editor of the Post—Sir: To an observer of world affairs two hypotheses present themselves at this juncture. The first is that the relation established between Hitler and Stalin is the conventional one between imperialists, and the object is to grab territories and power in the old fashion. I fear that this is an oversimplification of the problem.

To begin with, whether you are with or against them, you must admit that the Russians from the very beginning of their bolshevik revolution hewed close to a very definite and clear-cut policy, that of replacing the profit or capitalistic economic system by the socialistic or Marxist nonprofit economic system for service only. They may from time to time have deviated in method and technique but not from their main objective. The great rift with Trotsky was over policies in attaining the end.

On the other hand, the Nazi revolution in Germany was brought about by a group of adventurers whose main goal is self-aggrandizement and world domination. Let me emphasize world domination as distinguished from any particular theory or system; such a domination to be exercised by a small hierarchy with a fuehrer at the head, who for the present is Hitler. To attain their end they were and are prepared to utilize all and every means, physical, mental or spiritual.

Hence, the conglomeration of various ideologies, racial, religious, social, political and economic. They use them as needed, ready to discard any or all of them as the emergency dictated.

That there was and is an unbridgeable gulf between the Communists and Nazi ideologies was well recognized by their respective protagonists, Hitler and Stalin. Hence the bitterness, the invectives and abuse each indulged in against the other up to a few weeks ago.

The question now arises, are the Russians so dumb and stupid as to fall into the trap that Hitler set for them? Are they bereft of their senses to help in setting up of two super-states—not merely great powers, mind you, but super-states—Hitler with a constellation of satellite states to the West and Japan ruling over China to the East, as Mr. Lippmann suggests?

Doesn't Stalin know that after a brief respite Russia will be attacked by both of them? And even if they are so naive and gullible as to trust their future neighbors, will they not feel obliged to maintain a vast military establishment sufficient to repel both potential enemies; an establishment that will suck in at least one-third of their energies and delay them in building up Russia economically and industrially?

No; I state my judgment that Stalin will utilize the present unique opportunity to surround himself with a constellation of small states friendly to the Russian ideal. His first step is to annex and bolshevize a considerable part of what was Poland, west of him; and what is significant is the talk of setting up a Polish buffer state, which is to be not a Nazi, but a Bolsheik republic. Remember also the lingual, racial and cultural kinship between Russia, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia. The rumblings now heard from Czecho-Slovakia are significant. Bear in mind, too, the reported efforts of Russia to organize a Balkan block for mutual defense.

The question will be asked, suppose that that is so, how will that help world peace?

Two factors tended in the past to arouse our ire against the Bolsheviks. One is the ceaseless propaganda initiated by the English and French ruling classes to prevent the contagion of communism from affecting their peoples, and the second, the ill-advised and futile propaganda machines set up by the Russians in other countries, including the United States, in their early efforts to bring about world revolution. Both of these factors are now disappearing. France and England, and now we, too, realize that Nazism is by far the more formidable enemy, and Stalin has practically reversed the policy of the need of world revolution and discontinued his subsidies to communistic movements outside of Russia.

As distasteful as it must be to us to deal with the Russia of the present complexion, it should be remembered that in the early history of our own revolution and the establishment of our republic, the rest of the world eyed us then very much like Russia is looked upon now. Tom Paine's "Common Sense" and "Appeal to Reason" was no more palatable then than the tracts of present-day communistic propaganda, nor did we ever show ourselves squeamish in establishing and maintaining relations with the various forms of governments south of us.

JOSEPH L. TEPPER.

Excerpts From Our Letters

"Sample Of Propaganda"

Neil McKechnie's letter from Toronto, Canada, is just a sample of the type of British sympathy propagandas that are now being sent to this country to high-pressure public opinion in favor of another sacrifice of American men. American public opinion was influenced in the World War by the same fear, subtly developed by British propagandists and encouraged by British sympathizers in letters to the press in this country, that if Germany won she would then come over and clean up on the United States. When the German fleet arrived at Scapa Flow it was discovered that it did not contain a vessel that could have crossed the Atlantic and fought a battle in our waters.—F. F., Washington.

Third Choice

Is our only choice between Hitlerism and England? Of course it is not. There is a third choice—we can be pro-American. Why not plead that cause more strongly, bringing out the fact that we are neither German nor British, that we do not desire to be allied with the cause of either? This is really what the people want even though The Post seems to fail to see it.—Hoi Polloi, Washington.

Influence Of Letters

Surely our lawmakers have more confidence in their own intelligence and more respect for their solemn duty than to be swayed either way from their considered judgment by a flood of letters founded on misinformation or instigated from one individual source. The average citizen evidently has confidence in his Senator or Representative; believes that he will do his patriotic duty as he sees it in such important matter, and leaves him alone. No doubt this flood of letters adds up to just nothing in the matter of qualified considered judgment.—E. M. Peterson, Washington.

For Miss Thompson

Here's to Dorothy Thompson for acting upon Col. Lindbergh's suggestion that we question the motives of all who would influence us by radio or the printed word: This hero of ours, once decorated in the name of "unser Fuhrer" asked for it from coast to coast and who could give him what he asked for with more punch than your ace woman columnist.—"Small Potatoes," Washington.

Profiteer

For this country to supply munitions to either side is to make us the worst profiteer of all—the one who profits by the death and suffering of great numbers of human beings.—C. E. Wright, Washington.

Let's Be Sincere

If we are going to stay out, then, by all the gods there be, let's stay out and be sensible and sincere about it. It is no more neutral to sell to a man who is in a fight a gun for cash than to give it to him, and all the oratory in the world will not make it so.—Fred B. Woodward, Washington.

"Ought To Be Carcful"

We don't need a Maginot line now between us and Canada, the Bermudas, the French and British Guinana, and the Falkland Islands. But if these lands should be captured by Germany, and converted into German air bases and naval bases, goodness knows what we should need. We ought to be careful now about what kind of "neutrality" we follow. —J. Crispin Murphy, Lynchburg, Va.

Mr. Roosevelt's Intentions

Emergency or no emergency wouldn't it help to clear the atmosphere if Mr. Roosevelt would let us know whether he intends to return the Government to the people at the end of the eight-year period set by unbroken tradition as the limit of one-man rule in the U. S. A.?—E. V. Wilcox, Chevy Chase, Md.

"Cooler And Less Biased"

Does it not seem reasonable that an act which was made law in a time when the minds of legislators were cooler and less biased than now, is a more valid one and a saner one to adhere to, than proposals which come at a time when emotions are inflamed by war propaganda and the irresistible course of events?—K. L. M., College Park, Md.

Senators' Duty

It is every Senator's duty to vote on this neutrality bill according to his own heart and conscience uninfluenced by hopes of financial gain to himself or others through the sale of war materials.—Marion Wylie Murphy, Washington, Pa.

Source Of Policy

Let us agree that our neutrality springs, not from lifelessness, but from hope—from a belief that we are somehow secure in this world where now is witnessed the greatest relapse into barbaric force which history has ever known. Our spirits are not dead; they are asleep. Our concern, therefore, is not as to whether freedom will win, but as to whether we, ourselves, can find a way to dodge, not only the fight, but also all responsibility as to the outcome.—Bolling Somerville, Norwood, Va.

What To Do?

What are we going to do about these malicious forces which are ever working for the destruction of our American standards of democracy? Nothing, as usual. Are we going to allow communism the liberty and freedom with which to destroy our liberty and freedom?—Harry Daniels, Washington.

Mexican Canal

I was very favorably impressed with the recent letter of Mr. Harry Orme in The Post regarding the proposal to build an interoceanic canal to supplement the Panama Canal. I agree most heartily with Mr. Orme that Congress should withhold its approval of the Nicaragua Canal project until it finds out about the alternate suggestion of a Mexican canal.—Leland Barton, Washington.

Our Destiny To Keep Peace Here, Reader Thinks

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: The territorial integrity of that little republic we once knew as Poland ceases to exist. Whether or not it will ever be recreated, only the future can tell. The fact remains that Poland, the Poland of Kosciuszko, Paderewski and Josef Beck is no more.

This is not the first time she has been partitioned, for back across the centuries into the years 1663-1665, we find that the same Poland was destined to meet a similar fate and ironically enough at the hands of one of the two present aggressors.

Poland's dissolution is not a pipe dream, nor can it be construed to appear as even a nightmare of the wildest imagination. It is a hard, cruel and cold-blooded fact. That is the way they do things in Europe; that is the way they have always done things in Europe.

We must, of course, recognize that there is an opposition to this sort of maneuvering and we find it manifested in the cause of the Allies, Britain and France. What can be done about it—the future still holds the trump card. Whether there is any justice in what has been done is a matter of opinion. We do know, at least, what has brought it about. We remember the last conflagration. We also remember the armistice, and we, likewise, remember what the terms of that armistice were.

We remember that they agreed to a peace, but a peace which was to bind the German Republic to an ironclad cask of social, political, and economic regimentation. In the conferences were such men as Clemenceau, the great exponent of the balance-of-power theory and one to see that his native France gained a place in the sun. Then there was the famed Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain, who with the other chieftains of his dominions planned a stringent peace that the glory of the empire might survive. Orlando of Italy and Saionji of Japan did their part, finally culminated by the ingenious theories of the student President, Woodrow Wilson.

In speaking of aggression and the imperialistic tendencies of nations, we must not forget our own little excursions across border lines at the expense of the territorial integrity of certain nations. Like the Texas revolt back in 1836 and the annexation of Hawaii, Uncle Sam has done his share in appropriating certain lands. Remember the famous utterance of our Minister to Hawaii, John L. Stephens when he stated, "The Hawaiian pear is now fully ripe, and this is the golden hour for the United States to pluck it." I will concede, however, this Nation a much cleaner record in that respect than that of the British Lion.

Now please do not miscontrue me when I make such statements. This writer abhors aggression, but I merely want to show some precedents on our own part of what Hitler and his cohorts are doing. I am not in sympathy with this procedure, but I do feel it is absolutely none of our business.

As for the United States, it is imperative that we stay aloof and assume the attitude of the cautious watcher. We have between us and the trouble abroad a natural barrier potentially more powerful than half-dozen navies and yet we cannot close our eyes to the need for a fleet second to none. We are also confronted with probably more coastline to defend than any other nation. We must build a navy five times bigger than any, if need be. We must build a navy which any combination of powers will be forced to respect and in so doing issue warnings that we will tolerate no international discrepancies as regards their attitude toward the Western Hemisphere.

We have an immediate duty to ourselves and to our sister republics. Keep this side of the world at peace and set an example for the other side to follow. We can't keep the peace by involving ourselves in somebody else's war. This is our destiny and we are fortunate that fate should award us with such a role. "War is Not an Act of God, But a Crime of Man."

War And Politics

The impression given me is that certain Senators are first politicians and secondly Americans. In their calculations there seems to be no recognition of the undeniable fact that this present war represents a conflict between light and the powers of darkness.—M. S. Woollard, Baltimore, Md.

'Matters Of Fact'

By Ernest Lindley

The Embargo And International Law

IF THE ARMS EMBARGO is lifted it will be in spite of a great many of the arguments made by opponents of the embargo. Some of the arguments are palpably absurd. Some are based on downright misinformation.

This column is always reluctant to challenge the facts of a fellow-columnist. Every writer makes a certain number of mistakes about his facts, no matter how careful and conscientious he is. However, some of the statements now being put forward as "facts" are so obviously wrong that it seems worth while to devote this space to examining a few of them.

1. THE ASSERTION that international law requires the repeal of the embargo. This was implied by the President in his message to the current special session of Congress and has been asserted flatly by numerous writers. A few days ago Miss Dorothy Thompson wrote to the effect that "nearly everybody who knows anything about international law" favors lifting the embargo.

Maybe so. But nearly everybody who knows anything about international law concedes that an embargo on the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war is entirely consistent with international law. On that point this column has several times quoted various authorities. Last Thursday the similar conclusions of still other authorities were printed by Arthur Krock of the New York Times, who, like his paper, favors repeal of the embargo. Mr. Krock found it necessary to dismiss the President's assertion that return to international law is the "crux of the issue," because "the authorities do not support him (the President) in this position."

2. CERTAIN STATEMENTS in Mr. Walter Lippmann's column of last Thursday, "New Embargoes for Old." Mr. Lippmann said the defenders of the arms embargo have been telling us that it is "'unneutral' to change the rules of the game once war has been started. Well, the embargoes which they like and approve in the Pittman bill change the rules of the game. They lay embargoes which prevent the Allies from buying transportation and credit. These two embargoes are of great importance. They did not exist when war broke out, and if it is unneutral to repeal the embargo against selling arms, it is just as unneutral to lay two new embargoes against the sale of transportation and credit."

Of course, the argument that it is "unneutral" to change the rules in the middle of the game is fallacious. It is the neutral's privilege to change the rules whenever and as often as he pleases, provided he does so for the purpose of remaining a nonparticipant in the war and provided that he enforces his rules against all belligerents alike.

Mr. Lippmann, however, is wrong in writing of an "embargo" on credit as a new rule which is to be introduced in the middle of a game. The embargo on credit exists already. In fact, it is a double embargo, because it is required by two separate laws. The first of these is the Johnson act, passed in 1934, forbidding credit to nations which defaulted on their war debts. The British and the French embargoed themselves under this law by failing to make payments due on their war debts. (Incidentally, they pleaded inability to obtain dollars with which to make their payments. It now appears, however, that they have plenty of dollars—billions of them—with which to buy war supplies in this country.)

IN THE SECOND PLACE, the existing neutrality law, passed in 1937, forbids loans to nations at war. The new Pittman bill merely carries forward this prohibition, with certain minor changes.

Fifty per cent of Mr. Lippmann's argument on this point is, therefore, based on an error in fact. The other half is concerned with the "embargo" on transportation: the requirement that belligerent nations take full responsibility for the transportation from our shores of goods which they buy here, plus the provision for keeping American ships completely out of war zones. Mr. Lippmann seems to think this is a kind of penalty to the Allies.

It is a penalty, but at the same time it is a benefaction. It means, in substance, that we will not protest against their all-inclusive contraband lists. It means that we will not attempt to ship goods in American-flag ships to such neutral nations as Holland, Belgium and the Scandinavian states. It means, in effect, that we will not interfere in any way with the Allied blockade of Germany, which presumably is the strongest weapon on which the Allies have.

Contrary to Mr. Lippmann's assertions and insinuations, the "cash and carry" or "come and get it" plan does not work to the disadvantage of the Allies; it is to their great benefit. In this column's opinion, it is much more to their benefit than they have any right to expect from this country, especially since their "cash," their capacity to buy, exists largely because of their failure to make reasonable settlements of their debts to us on account of World War I and because of our ostrich-like readiness to take gold and silver for burial in the ground, in exchange for useful American goods.

3. THE EFFORTS to portray Great Britain and France as poor, weak countries, in contrast with the might of Nazi Germany. As an example, take Miss Dorothy Thompson's column of last Wednesday, in which she wrote of the Allies as dependent upon their ability to "purchase machine power in this country."

Miss Thompson wrote:

"Now, if nations small in area and low in resources, which are primarily commercial—which depend for their existence on trade—are going to be shut out of normal markets at the moment when those markets are absolutely vital to them, such nations will either disappear or the most ruthless imperialism will have to be revived and colonies subjugated and absolutely owned. Otherwise it will not be possible for sea-going countries small in area and poor in natural resources, like Great Britain, to exist, except on the terms of great land powers which have all resources inside their borders."

From this statement no one would suspect that Miss Thompson had ever heard of the British Empire. Without reliance upon us or any other neutral nation for a single dollar's worth of goods, the British Empire has two or three times the resources of Germany in raw materials. The manufacturing capacity of Great Britain and France combined, apart from their empires, exceeds that of Germany. Grant Germany free access to the iron ore of Sweden, to the coal and oil of Poland, to the oil of Rumania, and to the foodstuffs of Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Denmark and Scandinavia. Germany is still a poor country in comparison with the British Empire. Add the French Empire and the contrast is even more striking.

If Germany should obtain unrestricted access to the resources of Russia, the balance would be changed, of course—although it might be two or three years before those resources could be developed sufficiently to meet Germany's requirements. Meanwhile, if the British and French can keep the sea lanes open, in the face of submarine and aerial attacks, their resources are immensely superior to those of Germany. It is because of that that they are resorting to blockade.

THE FRENCH and the British may be behind Germany in certain phases of rearmament, but that is due to no lack of materials or of industrial capacity. Nor, it should be noted, are they deficient in manpower. Without counting their empires they have, between them, nearly as large a population as Germany has. Including their empires their numerical superiority is tremendous. The French have trained and armed as fighting troops large numbers of their colonial subjects. The British have done so on a much smaller scale.

However, in one British dominion alone—India—there are more than 350,000,000 people, between two and three times as many people as there are in the United States. There is the greatest reservoir of manpower in the world outside of China. If the Indians cannot be mustered to fight to save the Empire of which they are a part, we might at least pause to inquire why our resources, and perhaps eventually our manpower, should be called upon to save the British Empire—including India—for the British.

If the British and French Empires should be subjected to simultaneous attack by three or four other armed powers—Germany, Russia, Japan and Italy—they might be overwhelmed. But that has not come to pass. In any event, they are no weaklings. Their resources in materials, industrial capacity, and manpower are vast, without calling upon us for any assistance whatsoever except our normal peacetime exports to them.

The Ride To Fame

By Scott Hart

JUST BEFORE the century's turn, when America wore no stiff corset on its heartstrings, a great engineer named Casey Jones was sounding his whippoorwill whistle through the Middle Western nights and his fame was streaming like a rush of cinder dust along the rails. That fame, thanks to America's ear for a good ballad, will long endure.

The book, "Casey Jones," by Fred J. Lee, a one-time conductor, treats Casey with a seriousness commensurate with his fame in life and the tuneful legend that became Casey in death. The author has no cheek for a tongue to fit in; he seizes sentiment unflinchingly and if this is a weakness it turns to advantage here. The emotional breath of the nineties is blown over the pages; the dim flickering of oil lights in old railway stations illumines them. A professional writer might have used the same material to greater literary effect; but Mr. Lee probably has offered it—dialogue and all—more nearly as it was.

It is heartening to find a "last word" book discharging its hero at the end as a hero untrammeled still in plume and feather. So let's see how this comes about, how the man and the legend fare:

John Luther Jones was of good parentage. His father, a school teacher and his mother a strong woman, moved from Missouri to Cayce, Ky. He was destined to wear the name of that village as his own and to make it immortal. The boy grew up with his brothers and sisters in these deep, hinterland tissues of America. The railroad fever touched John Luther early. Standing by the railroad tracks, Cayce's chief avenue of interest, he would belabor the trainmen with questions. He resolved to become a great engineer and, being a good baseball player first, was given a job as a telegrapher apprentice with off-hours on the railroad teams catching staff. Of course he didn't stay there; fate moved him—as it did an Alger character or Gen. Grant—and in due course he sat on the right side of a locomotive cab.

CASEY was a swashbuckler, all right, but this was a mechanism to offset an inborn shyness. He was a good boy and a great engineer who ran his trains on time. The companies—first the M. & O., later the Illinois Central—liked him and the officials pushed him along. Just as a blooded horse responds to a capable jockey's hands, so locomotives responded to Casey Jones.

He was powerfully-built—once he licked the stuffing out of Boomer Bill Driscoll, a dreaded bully. He talked the railroad lingo, acted in the best roundhouse tradition. He was all that would appeal to a railroad man. And this knight of the throttle gained a troubadour who gave his story to the world.

JOHN LUTHER JONES

This troubadour was a nondescript Negro named Wallace Saunders, a mysterious "Guinea man" who frequented the lewd resorts about the yards and worked by whim and need for the railroad. In appearance, he was as stepping from a black dream. And there were dreams of his own that imperilled the hero he worshipped, Casey Jones. In slumber, he saw Casey lying dead, under a bale of hay, with shelled corn scattered around. Twice he told the engineer of these premonitions, venturing that the third would signal Casey's doom. It was he who composed the song of Casey and Boomer Bill, sung by the section hands to Casey's fame; he kept bobbing up uncannily along the line, warning Casey of death and baled hay, and, when the end did arrive, he sang his melody:

"Come all you Rounders, I want you to hear,
"The story told of a brave engineer;
"Casey Jones was the Rounder's name.
"A high right-wheeler of mighty fame."

THE DOOM that Wallace prophesied came to Casey the night of April 29, 1900, during an epic run of the Cannonball delivered to Casey off schedule—at Memphis. Sim Webb, colored fireman, was knocking the firebox door as Casey sought to gain the lost minutes. Farmers along the right-of-way heard the whippoorwill call, turned themselves over, saying: "Casey Jones, doubling back South on No. 1. And running fast." Here Mr. Lee shovels out the drama, thick and fast as the train roars on at more than 100 miles an hour.

"Passengers flattened their noses to the window panes and peered out into the darkness. They could see nothing. But frequent applications and releases of the airbrakes, accompanying jolts and jerks, and now and then an overpowering uncanny sense of breathlessness, told them that they were being carried along faster than they had ever been before."

Casey did all he could when he saw the rear end of a freight looming just ahead. He thought of everyone but Casey. "For the second time in the years that he was a hoghead (engineer) Casey Jones dynamited his engine. In virtually one motion the throttle was thrust in, the Johnson-bar tugged into reverse, the airbrake lever shifted to emergency and the sand dome opened wide."

"Jump Sim! Unload!" he cried. Casey and Sim leaped, to land in a clump of bushes 90 feet away. Only two were seriously injured. Casey alone was killed. Relief workers found him with an iron bolt through his neck and a bale of hay across his body. Shelled corn from one of the wrecked freight cars was scattered about the right of way. Wallace Saunders, mourning for Casey, went singing around the yards:

"Casey says: 'Fireman don't you fret,
"I'm going to run her till she leaves the rail
"Keep knocking at the firedoor; don't give up yet.
"Or make it on time with the Southern mail."

"Some time after Casey's death when the song began to be hummed, whistled and sung—the performers using such words as they could recall or themselves improvise—several of Casey's friends began to urge Wallace to give them the words to the ballad as he sang them . . . Wallace, mysterious and reticent, steadfastly refused until Engineer John R. Gaffney coaxed him with a bottle of gin."

Various later versions are possibly better known than Saunders original. If Saunders took some liberties with facts to make a rhyme, some of those who elaborated on his work took much greater liberties with Casey's character. Unseemly and libelous lines are sometimes still sung to the original air. But the truth is Casey was a virtuous and home-loving man.

The Human Surplus

"WASTED MANPOWER, THE CHALLENGE OF UNEMPLOYMENT," by Corrington Gill. (Norton, $2.75.)

AS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER of the WPA and before that as an economist with the Federal Employment Stabilization Board and Assistant Administrator of the FERA and CWA, Corrington Gill has a background of experience perfectly designed for the writing of a book on the problem of unemployment in America. "Wasted Manpower" is as challenging as its subtitle to the complacent who view unemployment, as, variously, an individual's fault and responsibility, a temporary excrescence on the body economic, an "un-American" anachronism to be wished out of existence.

The number of complacent ones, it is believed, is decreasing yearly but they are sufficiently evident to be asked to attend a book like this that says clearly, America will always have a minimum of four to five million unemployed, and that, while tracing the background and present of the relief question, presents also certain responsible replies to that question.

Mr. Gill groups the economic factors which produce unemployment into several types and explains each; one, frictions in industry, which usually involve only short terms of unemployment; two, seasonal idleness, inherent in any business that must depend for productivity on suitable weather conditions or holiday periods; three, a chronic shortage of new investment opportunities; that would, if created, use now idle workers; four, structural unemployment (including technological) brought about by an industry's change of location, installation of labor-saving devices, etc., and, in addition, often robbing the worker not only of his job but of his occupation; and, five, cyclical unemployment, caused by business ups and downs which seem at present to be inevitable to our economic system.

The amplification of these points, together with a general discussion of the American economy today and the volume and duration of unemployment, make up the first half of "Wasted Manpower." Mr. Gill follows with a detailed picture of the answers so far found to the problem—the inadequacies of relief work in the past, its growth and increased efficiency in the 1930s through FERA, CWA, PWA, etc. During the course of this succinct explanation of the work of these agencies—a miniature chronicle that alone makes the book of value—Mr. Gill also illuminates the question of public spending, giving valid answers to the critics of this Government policy but believing at the same time that such a policy of itself is no panacea and must be accompanied by other methods to promote private investment as a complement to public spending.

For the future Mr. Gill recommends the further extension and improvement of security programs (old age, destitute, youth aid, impoverished rural areas, etc.), so that our human resources may be conserved. In the fight against unemployment, he asks for a reorganized employment service covering th ecountry, permitting the job-seeker and the job-giver to meet in a minimum of time for both sides.

He advocates also a planned program of training and retraining of workers, already an important division of WPA activity but one that must be amplified and extended. Regularization and stabilization of business (at least, at first, to the extent of reducing the volume of seasonal and frictional losses), continued research on the problem of credit control, loans or subsidies to certain key industries, lower rates of interest, easing of the price system, certain tax revisions, and, of course, a comprehensive work program involving a permanent program of public works complemented by an unemployment program of the WPA type—these are Mr. Gill's replies to the challenge of unemployment.

Briefly, this is what he advises: Increase consumption levels so that relatively more of our national income will be spent and relatively less saved; and, second, encourage private industry and push public investment so as to utilize the money that is saved.

The concise summary that a review of this sort must present cannot demonstrate the shades of meaning and the subsidiary material which make this book not a dogmatic preachment of an individual cure-all policy but a considered series of thoughts and impressions by a man versed in the complications and ramifications of what is, today, perhaps America's most pressing problem. "Wasted Manpower" is a welcome contribution by an experienced economist toward clarification of a vitally important question.

A Brain Truster's Confessions

Mr. Moley's Memoirs Of The New Deal's Earlier Years

By Merlo J. Pusey.

IF RAYMOND MOLEY had followed a certain popular trend he might have entitled his book "Inside the New Deal." The fact that he calls it "After Seven Years" should not, however, be attributed wholly to his striving for originality. It suggests also that Mr. Moley had some qualms about the propriety of a close adviser to the President turning the New Deal inside out while the Administration is still in office, and that he therefore chose a title which would emphasize the lapse of time since he helped to put Mr. Roosevelt into the White House.

No doubt many of Mr. Moley's readers will share the feeling that his forceful and candid critique has been published prematurely. It gives a close-up view of President Roosevelt that historians will find extremely valuable. For that matter, it brings out into the open information that is helpful in the formation of an intelligent public opinion today. Yet the fact that Mr. Moley has taken advantage of his intimate association with the President to reveal details that were not intended for the public ear detracts from an otherwise impressive achievements.

IT WOULD NOT be accurate to say that Mr. Moley has written an expose of the New Deal. Nor is his book a denunciation of the President. It emphasizes his sincerity, the power of his personality and his remarkable courage. Although a greater emphasis is laid upon the President's flair for hastily devised experiments, his vindictive action against his opponents and his casual way of trying to compromise irreconcilable viewpoints, the tone of the volume reflects more sorrow than anger.

That sorrow arises from Mr. Moley's deep conviction that the President has let slip a "golden opportunity" to prove that a liberal movement can preserve its unity and direction by restraint. Progressivism will have another chance. "But the conviction that progressivism is no more than a vague and muddled impulse to do good," says the former White House adviser, "will make the next effort so much the harder."

Mr. Moley insists that there never was a definite break in his relations with the President. Their intimate association began when Mr. Moley was asked to assemble data and assist in the formulation of policies and preparation of speeches for the 1932 campaign. He has not expected to follow the President to Washington. Yet for a time he was the President's most frequent adviser. His resignation from the post of Assistant Secretary of State came in September, 1933, as a result of the fiasco of the World Economic Conference. But he continued to serve Mr. Roosevelt as an adviser and a technician in speech preparation until the 1936 Democratic National Convention. By that time the differences in their views had become so pronounced that further personal association seemed pointless.

RAYMOND MOLEY

MR. MOLEY is at his best in describing the pulling and hauling of antagonistic forces within the New Deal. His story of Mr. Roosevelt's Sioux City speech on tariffs in 1932 throws a revealing light upon the conflicting policies the Administration has since followed. Candidate Roosevelt's advisers included such low-tariff men as Secretary (then Senator) Hull and Charles W. Taussig as well as such high-tariff men as the late Senator Walsh, Senator Pittman and Mr. Moley. Both groups submitted speeches they would like to have the standard-bearer make. Mr. Moley was left speechless, he writes, by Mr. Roosevelt's request that he "weave the two together."

Certainly that incident does much to explain the Administration's enthusiasm for reciprocal trade agreements while it has also proceeded with industrial, labor and agricultural policies that make international trade more difficult. Amid the clamor for removal of trade barriers, the AAA has gone so far as to subsidize wheat and cotton exports, which is a direct incentive to the erection of new barriers.

A STILL more interesting story is that of the World Economic Conference. Having encouraged the meeting of statesmen at London to rescue the world from the depression, the President sent out the American delegation with only vague instructions. It was soon hopelessly divided.

One task of the conference was to discuss world economic problems, particularly trade barriers. But with our delegation on the sea, Mr. Roosevelt announced that he would not ask the Congress then in session for tariff-bargaining powers. One other task of the conference was to bring some order out of the chaotic fluctuation of currencies divorced from gold. Several tentative agreements on this subject were reached by the delegates, but each was vetoed by the President. Meanwhile, Mr. Moley was rushed to London as a liaison between the President and our delegation in London.

In desperation, the delegates working on the monetary problem, drafted a statement of policy to the effect that gold would ultimately be re-established as a measure of international exchange value, but that each nation reserved the right to decide when it would undertake stabilization. The statement was designed to save the gold bloc countries from further loss of their monetary reserves. All of the American delegates seem to have considered it harmless from the New Deal point of view. Reviewing his instructions, Mr. Moley concluded that the President would be delighted over the weakness of the proposal.

So the statement was cabled to Washington for approval. All the President's advisers on these matters, both in London and this country, had given their indorsement to the statement. That was the only hope of saving the conference from a complete collapse. London waited in a frenzy of impatience for the President's reply. He was at Campobello beyond reach by telephone. When his message finally reached London it was a flat rejection of the statement. Perhaps the President had misunderstood its import. But it seems more likely from the circumstances related by Mr. Moley that after dispatching his messenger to London he had been converted to the discredited Warren theory that commodity prices can be stabilized by varying the price of gold.

A Possibly Premature Book Of Undoubted Historical Value

AT ANY RATE, the President sent a "bombshell" message to the conference which clearly indicated the trend of his thinking on the monetary issue but which nevertheless asked that body to go ahead and cure the fundamental economic ills of the world. Europe exploded with resentment. The President had scuttled the conference, which he had previously done so much to promote, for the sake of a reckless experiment that was bound to fail.

This theme of "capricious experimentation" is carried through most of the later chapters. Once an experiment was launched the President would refuse to subject it to a pragmatic test; it became "an indispensable element in a great, unified plan." Failure of such plans, plus carping criticism from some sources and overconfidence resulting from the 1936 election, led to such forays as the attack upon the Supreme Court and the 1938 "purge."

Mr. Moley is one of a long list of advisers who have parted company with the President. That fact lends strength to his statement that Mr. Roosevelt "has never been able to maintain long relationships with men whose minds are strong and assertive." "It is this shortcoming," Mr. Moley concludes, "that leaves him so tragically, at the end of his second term, with on man among his close associates to whom he can point as a likely successor."

"After Seven Years" is described by the publishers as a political autobiography. But it is not as an autobiography that it will be read. Indeed, Mr. Moley's interjection of personal items into what is essentially a story of the New Deal as he saw it tends to detract from the interest which the book otherwise sustains. It is written in vigorous and sometimes entertaining style. Undoubtedly it is one of the best books that have been written on the Roosevelt Administration.

"AFTER SEVEN YEARS," by Raymond Moley. (Harpers, $3.)

The Novel As 'Atonement'

By Mary Ross

"REJECTED GUEST" is published on the tenth anniversary of Richard Aldington's first and probably best-known novel, "Death of a Hero." Even after a decade the astringent bitterness of that first story must remain clearly in the minds of many who read it. So sustained was its mood that it might almost have been written in a continuous stretch, at white heat, the heat of outraged idealism.

Mr. Aldington declared in the prologue to that book that he was writing as an atonement, "a desperate effort to wipe off the blood guiltiness," the stupidity and waste and torture of George Winterbourne's death in battle a week before the Armistice. What he did not write there, perhaps did not realize, was that the cards had been stacked against George even before he went to war. It isn't cheering to speculate as to what life would have been for George if he hadn't sprung to his feet to catch the machine-gun fire. The way his father and mother and wife and mistress took the news of his death makes one guess that life might have been only less acutely torturing. To say this is not, of course, to doubt the agony of war, which made George oblivious to all that he had to hope for as well as to fear.

That story of ten years ago is like a ghost in the background of this year's "Rejected Guest." This book is of the present, a present so nearly contemporaneous that there are paragraphs in which the author might have been writing of the past few weeks, rather than the weeks of Munich.

The story is of David Norris, whose father died in France in 1915, though he had wanted so much to live to come back to marry the girl he had known in the summer when his brigade was encamped for training in the south of England. As Mr. Aldington remarks caustically at the start, David was "one of the little army of war babies, about whom so much was talked at the time and nothing apparently has been done since."

David was born fatherless and, for all practical purposes, motherless. His grandparents took on, fortunately with real affection, the sickly child from whom his 19-year-old mother shrunk, partly because of the neighbors' gibes, more because of the responsibility, and a bit because she could not bear his intrusion into her memory of her brief idyll with the boy who had been his father. A couple of years later, however, she married a prosperous butcher.

To the irremediable drawback of being fatherless, David added the handicap of being puny and also intelligent. His young life was as hellish as one might expect it to be in a small town, and the town itself and the hypocritically pious "gentleman's" school to which his grandparents struggled to send him were inexpressibly dreary.

Neither there nor in London, to which he escaped after his grandparents' death with the small savings they had left him, was he able to find the friends he wanted and needed. He had discovered beauty for himself, in nature and poetry and science and, for brief interludes, in love. He was unable to find companionship.

On a sudden impulse, when his money was almost gone and his studies not yet completed, he went to see his paternal grandfather, a lonely old baronet who had not even known of this grandson's existence. His likeness to the youth who had died 20 years before told the old man who he was. Then follows the episode that gives the book its title, David's sudden rise to ease and luxury.

The old men would not admit an illegitimate grandson, but he happily promised to will him half his fortune and, in the meantime, to make him a handsome allowance if he would stay away from England and refrain from claiming kinship. David had a string of golden months on the Riviera before his grandfather died—intestate.

But here, too, with beauty about him and with the power of presumed riches, he found neither peace nor enduring love nor friendship. When the old man's delay in making his will robbed him of the promised fortune, he found himself again, as he had in sordid town, in school, and in London, a "rejected guest." His new friends hardly concealed their relief at his departure.

David's story unravels in time of peace, though at the close the drumbeats of another war were coming nearer and nearer. Except for the agony of filth and weariness and terror that hung over the last years of George Winterbourne's life, this story often parallels the earlier.

In each of them Mr. Aldington wields the stinging lash of the idealist against the stupidity and cruelty that can wreck a child's life and, in so doing, a man's. In both there is the thrust of satire, of anger, below superficially debonair phrases. In the prologue to "Death of a Hero," Mr. Aldington wrote:

"Through a good many doubts and hesitations and changes I have always preserved a certain idealism. I believe in men, I believe in a certain fundamental integrity and comradeship, without which society could not endure . . . I disbelieve in bunk and despotism, even in a dictatorship of the intelligentsia."

"Rejected Guest" stands as pungent testimony that those beliefs and disbeliefs still endure.

"REJECTED GUEST," by Richard Aldington. (Viking Press, $2.50.)

By W. L. Schurz

EVEN IF HE had not been the greatest pioneer in the history of the American West, John Augustus Sutter's story would have been worth the reading for its own sake. Sutter was a fabulous personality, a bankrupt Swiss shopkeeper who became feudal lord of the Sacramento Valley and a legendary figure in early California. He was a many-sided adventurer—part Don Quixote, part Baron Munchausen, with a dash of W. C. Fields.

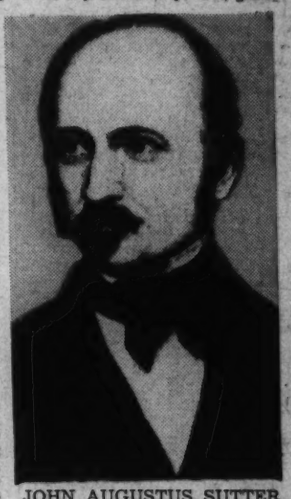
But the other side of him built up an empire about his establishment of New Helvetia, made subjects of thousands of Indians, and, if unwittingly, laid the groundwork for the easy American occupation of California.

There were high comedy in his life, like his inglorious part in the opera bouffe "battle" of Cahuenga, appropriately staged near the present site of Hollywood and so reminiscent of Frank Morgan's technicolor heroics in "The Gay Desperado." But there was much tragedy, as in his quarrel with the son who might have saved his too prodigal and credulous father from the rapacity of lesser men, and in the debacle of his fortunes that eventually followed the discovery of gold on his property, up to his death in Mades' Hotel in Washington after Congress had failed to pass a bill for his relief.

But between the tragedy and the comedy there was unrolled one of the most dramatic lives in American history, the story of a man who lived his life with colossal zest and spaciousness and open-handedness.

Mr. Zollinger, like his subject, was born in Switzerland. His biography of Sutter was based on long and careful research, much of it into sources never before used, but vital to a complete understanding of Sutter's extraordinary career. Though his treatment of Sutter is sympathetic, he has resisted the inevitable temptation to be emotional about such a dazzling figure and gives an objective picture of his contradictory nature. The style is clear and eminently readable. I believe it is to date the outstanding biography of the year.

MISS HAWTHORNE'S book on California cities succeeds very well in being what it was evidently intended to be, a chatty, gossipy picture—chronicle of all the cities and towns between Eureka and San Diego. It contains mild homeopathic doses of history and much about the leading buildings and other sights of the places whose romance and charm are catalogued. It is a friendly book, with nothing in it to offend the most rabid native son or the touchy local pride of any community. Yet, granting that all these towns are as admirable as their chambers of commerce and real estate dealers would have us believe, the author is often hard put to it to give them that air of glamour, though Mr. Suydam's fine drawings help create the illusion which is the very essence of the romantic. I, too, have a weakness for the Pueblos of California, but, having my favorites among them, I can only marvel at Miss Hawthorne's glowing and all-inclusive enthusiasm.



JOHN AUGUSTUS SUTTER

"Romantic Cities of California" is the kind of book that people used to keep on the parlor table and show to visitors when the conversation ran low or the stereopticon slides ran out.

IT IS PROBABLY to be expected that we should have more books about Mexico than about all the other 19 Latin American republics combined. As a next-door neighbor, and not always a "good" one, it is natural that anything unusual which happens in Mexico should be of interest to us. And something unusual is always happening there, things that are often very unorthodox by our standards, or things that vitally concern our own national welfare. Moreover, Mexico is a controversial country, the scene of a halting and long-drawn-out social revolution, in which religion and property rights are as truly at stake as in Russia. But, divorced from all these considerations, Mexico is worth many books, for it is an uncommonly interesting country.

Only those whose sympathies are uncompromisingly with the Left or Right—or tourists blind to all but the "picturesque" features of this amazing land—can write about Mexico with any certainty or conviction. An objective analyst who tries to be fair to both sides is baffled by the confusion he finds and ends by qualifying everything he writes. His book is liable to be full of "howevers" and "on the other hand," or he bogs down in a welter of weasel words that satisfy neither the partisan nor the Laodicean.

Mr. Evelyn Waugh belongs in the former category. He says: "I was a Conservative when I went to Mexico and everything I saw there strengthened my opinions." He condemns without reservation the revolution and its works, but particularly its expropriation of British oil companies and its persecution of the Catholic Church.

Yet, in spite of the rather lurid title, "Robbery Under the Law," of the original English edition, the book is scarcely a polemic. It is generally well-tempered and seldom lapses into invective. It would not make many converts from the other side, but it would be a very comforting and reassuring book to those who believe as Mr. Waugh believes.

As an intelligent Catholic, his statement of the religious question demands respect, even from those who would dissent from his treatment of historical facts or from his main thesis that religion is the only bond of national unity in Mexico. Except for the persistence of the faith against the anti-clericalism of the ruling regime, he sees in the revolution only "25 years of graft, bloodshed and bankruptcy."

He finds only a "hopeless, universal deterioration of things in Mexico." He minimizes the economic factors in the situation and magnifies the cultural heritage from Spain. In the latter connection, he makes this astounding statement: "The traditions of Spain are still deep in Mexican character, and I believe that it is only by developing them that the country can ever grow happy." And it is the Spain of Franco which Mr. Waugh would offer as a model for Mexico!

Regrettably for those who would like to rationalize all the goings-on within Mexico since the fall of Diaz to fit a definite formula, nothing is so simple as Mr. Waugh's single-mindedness would make it. He no more has all the truth than have the official apologists of the Cardenas government. But, whatever your inner leanings, you could profit in understanding from the reading of this skillfull apologia pro fide. The pity of it is that you will have learned little about Mexico—and so much of that little wrong.

"SUTTER, THE MAN AND HIS EMPIRE," by James Peter Zollinger. (Oxford, $3.50.)

"ROMANTIC CITIES OF CALIFORNIA," by Hildegarde Hawthorne. (Appleton-Century, $6.)

"MEXICO, AN OBJECT LESSON," by Evelyn Waugh. (Little, Brown, $2.50.)

Alger Girl

"IT'S A WOMAN'S BUSINESS," by Estelle Hamburger. (The Vangard Press, $2.50.)

AT A TIME when feminine success in business is popularly supposed to be largely a matter of personality, glamour, the game of contacts and lucky breaks, it is reassuring to find the old copybook formula of industry and initiative still working. Estelle Hamburger, who rose from a $12-a-week stenographer at Macy's to executive vice president of Jay Thorpe, one of America's most exclusive stores for women, has plenty of wit and verve, as she demonstrates in telling her story. But her rise in the field of fashion advertising was fundamentally in the rugged tradition of giving the job everything. Her tremendous enthusiasm for every task she undertook makes her book absorbing—even inspiring—reading.

Any young woman seeking any kind of business success may learn a great deal, not only about the fashion industry, but about the art of survival in office and factory from this book. The author is one of a coterie of women who in the last two decades have made seemingly spectacular rises in the field of feminine fashion—a field which seems to be cornering much of the industrial romance and adventure that once belonged exclusively to steel, copper, oil, etc. What this may indiate is something for the sociologist as well as the economist to ponder.

Spring Valley Display Home Is Opened

Planned Community Is Setting for New Colonial Residence

Importance of community planning and careful development is exemplified in Spring Valley's Washington Post display home which today enters the first week of a four-week exhibition. W. C. & A. N. Miller, developers of the community, have achieved a national reputation as leaders in the "planned community" idea.

In Spring Valley, as in Wesley Heights, the firm has anticipated and met every need for happy, comfortable, carefree family life. Unusual natural beauties of the sites have been carefully perserved. The Miller-Built houses themselves are the last word in convenience and comfort. Streets have been thoughtfully planned, thus assuring the continued maintenance of the community for fine residential purposes.

The display dwelling is a perfect example of our colonial forefathers' ideas in home design, adapted and improved to meet the demands of exacting twentieth century family life. Situated on a long, curvilinear street, the red brick dwelling is handsomely framed by a large grove of towering trees which gives it an air of permanence as enduring as the chaftsmanship itself.

The home was designed by W. C. & A. N. Miller's architectural department, and built by the firm's construction division. It is readily accessible to shopping and business districts, being but 14 motor minutes from the White House.

Traffic Hazards Averted

By laying out the community with long curvilinear streets and few intersections and by eliminating boulevard traffic arteries, the developers have solved a major peril in home community planning—traffic danger. The block in which The Post display home is located is approximately a quarter of a mile long, runs in a long, graceful curve from the hill crest of Fordham road to where Sedgwick street intersects with Tilden street at Rockwood parkway.

J. Harold Gooding, interior decorator, has furnished the home at 5059 Sedgwick street throughout with authentically styled, colonial-inspired furniture and draperies. Even the wall papers further the early American motif.

Exterior lighting effects on the evergreens and the trees, unusual in most exhibit homes, have been supplied by the Landscape and Garden Lighting Co., and show the beautiful nocturnal illumination which recent developments have made possible for well landscaped homes.

Center Entrance Plan

As one enters the dwelling's large reception hall, on the right is a little powder room with a full bath. Beyond the hall, a large library with fireplace forms an intermediate room between the large living and dining roms. These three rooms together comprise a suite of spacious accommodations for social functions.

From the living room, French doors lead to a large screened porch shaded by the tall trees on the site's rear. Beneath the porch an open portico is terrace level, providing an even further feature for enjoying to the fullest the dwelling's ideal development of out-of-doors living. Above the porch an open sun deck which is reached directly from the master bedroom is a delightful place to bask in privacy in healthful sun rays.

On The Post display home second and third floors are ample accomodations for even a very large family; six bedrooms and four baths. In the bedrooms are custom-planned closets, a special develop-

Capital Ranks Third in U. S. Building List

Only New York and Los Angeles Higher In Eight Months

Washington took third place in a list of 125 leading cities compiled by the Department of Labor and dealing with the volume of public and private construction in the first eight months of the current year. New York was again leader with building valued at $191,781,807 for the eight months, as compared with $247,823,927 in the corresponding period a year ago. Los Angeles was next with a volume aggregating $52,723,807, as against $46,570,488 for the eight months of 1938. Washington's total for the current eight months is $52,185,004, in comparison with $38,897,031, last year.

Valuation of private construction and repair work in the District during the past week was $455,325, an advance from $267,505, total of the preceding week, according to permits issued by the office of Col. John W. Oehmann, District inspector of buildings. Permits approved during the week provided for erection of 38 single-famiy dwellings and included the following:

Mrs. Ida Baylin, three three-story brick and cinder block apartment buildings at 301 Whittier street, 300 Aspen street and 6718 Third street northwest; cost, $102,000; G. T. Santmyers, architect.

Louis Brooks, three-story brick, cinder block and tile store and apartment building at 3300 Pennsylvania avenue southeast; cost, $40,000; Banks & Lee, Inc., builders; E. J. Conner, designer.

Ralph Realty Co., nine two-story brick and concrete block dwellings at 3936-3952 Blaine street northeast; cost, $35,000; William Crusemire, designer.

Potomac Land & Housing Co., seven two-story brick and cinder block flats at 101-113 P street southwest; cost, $28,000; G. T. Santmyers, architect.

John M. King, three two-story brick and cinder block dwellings at 4618-4622 Sargent road northeast; cost $16,000; Keith Hite, designer.

The Georgetown News announces the office of J. Leo Kolb, at 1237 Wisconsin avenue northwest, has been undergoing extensive remodeling for the past six weeks. Under direction of Architect Harvey Baxter, the office has been transformed into a pleasant Colonial background for business transactions. The front section's upper walls are painted Williamsburg green, and the lower portion paneled. Floors are covered in mottled linoleum and lighting fixtures have been changed to a modernistic design. On either side of the front door is a plaster plaque by Eugene Hannon, sculptor, depicting a horse-drawn fire engine, and bearing the inscription, "J. Leo Kolb, Insurance, Established 1902."

Home Prices Firm as Result Of War Start

Employment Rise Seen Affecting Real Estate Market

By Herbert U. Nelson,

Executive Vice President, National Association of Real Estate Boards.

Already communities have begun to answer for themselves the question: How will war in Europe affect real estate here? A firming of prices has been general. Ultimate effects of the war will depend primarily on its duration. A long war—assuming that we keep out if it, as is clearly our will to do—might nevertheless bring "controls" of various kinds that would be unfavorable. A war of a year or so would probably avoid any extreme distortion of normal industrial processes and balances and would be felt in rising real estate prices as well as in rise in industrial activity.

From first hand observation of economic conditions in Germany this summer, it appears to me that a really long war is improbable. The German economic machine for years past has been driven without let-up, at such terrific speed that both men and machines were this summer showing signs of strain and breakdown. Officials and others with whom I talked spoke of holdback measures they were then taking because of the need to conserve worn nerves and especially to conserve machines.

No Shock Period

Already we know that here there will be no period of shock. It may be, instead, that our initial excitment has led to an overestimate in some particulars as to what is likely to ensue. Any estimate of war emergency markets must, again, be based on estimated length of war. To be considered here is the question of how far the belligerants may be able to develop their sources of supply from among their colonies or from countries within their hegemony. That, too, is a matter of the time element involved.

Certainly whatever rise in employment and in family income we may experience in the months ahead is bound to affect the real estate market directly and favorably. In conjunction with this factor, and background of all that is likely to happen, is the world-wide inflationary influence that accompanies any major war. As price levels go up and dollars lose their purchasing power, investment in a home or in other well selected real estate becomes a repository that guards savings against loss. In any period of price rise the advantage of ownership as against renting is increased.

Mortgage rates and the mortgage structure are in a very favorable position for sound real estate advance on an even keel.

It is frequently and correctly pointed out that in 1914, at the advent of war we had been headed for a period of depression. In August of 1939 we were at a point where industrial indices of practically all kinds were already rising. Production of electricity in the United States, to cite an example, is already at an all-time high. Credit reserves are huge. Plant capacities are greatly on the plus side. New employment has a long way to go before it takes up the slack.

No Overexpansion

All this means that no expansion of "war baby" industries is likely to so overbalance us as to crowd out building. Best available present estimate of one Government economist, privately stated, is that 1940 as a building year will about repeat 1939, which now promises to be the best year since the depression, and that 1941 should be better.

But while "war babies" already begin to dread a "peace scare," the man who puts his savings into the puschase of a home or other real estate, properly selected, need not dread that a great deflation of his market will ensue with the coming of peace. In 1914 we were at the let-down period of a building "boom." At the present time we have behind us a nine-year accumulated deficit of housing construction, and we have done nothing for years to replace, and little to modernize, far less extend, our supply of business structures. Real estate gets its value from the most fundamental kind of human needs. Needs for the present supply are going to continue, and should expand, in war or in peace.

Building costs will be watched closely. Some minor increases have so far been reported.

Cheverly, Md., Fast-Growing Community

From Few Homes And Estates to 300 Houses in Few Years

Cheverly, Md., residential community northeast of the city, is one of the fastest growing suburbs in the country, according to Herbert Desilets, president of Housing Corporation, developers.

"Three years ago Cheverly consisted of a few farmhouses and small estates," said Mr. Desilets. "Today there are more than 300 homes, miles of paved streets, sidewalks, sewer, water and electric lines. Schools, churches and stores are close by." Mr. Desilet predicted that the population would double within two years.

"Our building schedule now calls for starting three houses a week, but indications are that we shall have to speed production very shortly, people showing a decided interest in Cheverly."

A check of the town records showed that permits have been filed so far this year for 62 dwelling units, and the corporation has 15 more ready to file. This compares with 75 permits filed during 1938.

Mr. Desilets said his company's development has extended to one of the highest points in the area, where home owners may obtain a fine view of the country. A new street, projected along a ridge, commands a vista of a large part of the Capital.

Clarence Gosnell Building

Clarence W. Gosnell, Inc., is builder and Leon A. Chatelain, jr., architect of 16 2-story brick dwellings to be erected for Howard Homes, Inc., at 1604-1684 Michigan avenue northeast, costing $88,000.

Flush-Type Door Grows in Popularity

The flush-type door, which presents a plain unbroken surface without paneling, first became popular when associated with homes of modern design. Because they harmonize with almost every type of interior decoration, they are being widely used to bring a modern apperance to many older homes.

One of the outstanding advantages of the flush door, in addition to its distinctive appearance, is that dust cannot lodge on its plain smooth surfaces. This makes the door sanitary and easy to clean or paint. Regular styles of hardware may be used with doors of the flush type.

Tiffey Builds Fifty Houses Of New Type

Row Houses Each Have 18-Foot Front, Six Spacious Rooms

A new type of home being presented today is an 18-foot front row house, of exceptionally pleasing architecture. It provides six spacious rooms, a full, light basement that opens out level with the generous back yard. Equipment is modern in every respect, with automatic gas heat and refrigeration. Floors are of selected oak and the trim is natural chestnut. The building has furred walls; windows and doors are caulked and weatherstripped, and the ceiling is amply insulated with rock wool.

Such a dwelling is characteristic of a new group built by J. B. Tiffey, opening of which is announced by Tiffey & Flynn. These homes are a feature of a development located just east of the intersection of New Hampshire avenue and Gallatin street northwest, where already more than 50 of the studio and two-family types have been built.

This project will provide more than 100 houses of different types, constituting one of the largest operations by an individual builder in the northwest section of Washington at the present time.

Location of this enterprise is particularly attractive from a residential viewpoint. It is very nearly surrounded by park areas. To the east is the new heavily wooded Fort Totten Park; on the south lies Soldiers Home grounds and on the west is the beautiful park-like Rock Creek Cemetery. There is a complete park and shop center at New Hampshire avenue and Farragut street, and bus service on New Hampshire avenue, providing 15 minutes' express service transportation to the center of the city. There is a furnished exhibit dwelling at 5020 North Capitol street.

Wyngate Home Uses Products Of Wide Note

House in Maryland Designed for Families Of Moderate Income

Utilization of nationally known building products is one of the features of the replica of the World's Fair No. 1 home being built at Wyngate, Md., by Permanent Homes, Inc., under the special franchise granted by the National Home Builder's Bureau, sponsors of the original dwelling in the "Town of Tomorrow."

The exact replica of the "dual duty" house is taking such definite shape that growing crowds of interested spectators are now able to obtain visual evidence of its final exterior appearance. A bungalow type home, it occupies a prominent central site in Wyngate, the new low-cost homes subdivision recently started on Old Georgetown road, Bethesda, Md.

From cellar to roof, the home will be an exact duplicate of the exposition house, which has been nationally publicized because of the multiple purposes of each of its rooms. At the same time the house is designed to meet the needs of families able to pay only $30 to $40 a month for shelter.

The home will have a picturesque roof of shingles in a blend of soft green colors, conspicuous not only because it stimulates the graining of hand-split shingles of wood, but also because it makes the grain visible at normal roof distances. Copper gutters, drain pipes and flashings will also feature the roof treatment.

Red cedar shingles for the side walls also will lend distinction to the irregular surfaces of the side walls. Use of four-square endless lumber for wall sheathing, roof sheathing and sub-flooring, as well as four-square guide line framing for all framing material including studs, joists and rafters provide sound construction.

Employment of seasoned, preshrunk packaged interior trim, the use of nationally known insulated interior finish, insulating lath and insulated sheathing coupled with the use of sealed insulation made from fiber closely resembling sheep wool and designed to shut out extremes of cold and heat. This insulation mat, chemically treated against termites, dry rot and vermin, is sealed in moisture proof paper.

Importance of proper window placement and construction is emphasized in the "dual duty" house. An important economy in comfortable heating of the house is the application of "window conditioning." Modern window conditioning applied to the World's Fair No. 1 demonstration home not only eliminates drafts, but also brings about great fuel savings without detracting from appearance.

"It has been possible to incorporate the highest grade of nationally known products in this house because of the co-operative enterprise which made the original World's Fair demonstration home possible," said George W. DeFranceaux, president of Permanent Homes, Inc.

August Gain of 8% Is Reported by Sec. Perkins

In contrast to the usual seasonal trend, value of building for which permits were issued in August revealed a sizable gain of 8 per cent as compared with July. Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins, reported yesterday. "The most important increase occuring in new residential building, which showed a gain of 21 per cent. Value of additions, alterations and repairs increased 12 per cent, but there was a decline of 18 per cent in permit valuation for new nonresidential buildings.

As compared with August, 1938, the increases were even more pronounced. Permit valuation for new residential buildings showed a gain of 34 per cent, an increase of 3 per cent for the new nonresidential buildings, and a gain of 18 per cent for additions, alterations and repairs. There was a rise of 22 per cent in the permit valuation for total building construction. These data are based on reports received by the Bureau of Labor Statistics from 2,087 cities of the United States having an aggregate population of 60,113,000.

During the first eight months of 1939, permits were issued in cities reporting to the bureau for building valued at $1,405,749,000, an increase of 26 per cent as compared with the corresponding period of 1938. Value of new residential building showed an increase of 38 per cent over this period. Value of new nonresidential building reflected a gain of 18 per cent, while additions, alterations and repairs showed a rise of 9 per cent.

Permits issued during August provided for 30,969 family-dwelling units. Of these, 7,960 were in projects under the jurisdiction of the United States Housing Authority. July permits provided for 25,646 units, of which 5,567 were in USHA projects. Data collected by the Bureau of Labor Statistics include contracts awarded by Federal and State governments in addition to private and municipal construction. For August, 1939, Federal and State construction amounted to $30,770,000, for July, 1939, to $21,579,000, and for August, 1938, to $16,347,000.

Permits were issued during August for the following important building projects: In Boston, Mass., for a USHA housing project to cost nearly $3,400,000; in Newark, N. J., for a USHA housing project to cost nearly $2,000,000; in Long Branch, N. J., for a USHA housing project to cost over $400,000; in Buffalo, N. New Home Opened In Spring Valley ment of W. C. & A. N. Miller home design. These are so arranged and equipped that they provide a place for every type of clothing and accessories. Long drawers at their bottom will care for blankets and woolens; a shoe rack on the back of the double doors will accommodate many pairs or footwear—and double doors themselves make it possible for one to select any garment from the clothing racks without dislodging or disarranging other dresses or suits hanging there. A group of drawers in one side of the closets cares for orderly keeping of lingerie, shirts, and the like—and small compartments above are ideal places for storing hats, costume flowers and other articles not in frequent demand.

The house has all the fine building features neccesary to a home of assured permanence. It is well insulated, metal weather-stripped, and all water pipes, downspouts, gutters, and flashings are of copper. Electricity and telephone conduits are built in, eliminating unsightly wires leading into the house. Cedar lined storage closets diminish summertime moth damage dangers. Fully automatic heating dispenses with furnace tending chores. A ventilating fan above the kitchen door draws away cooking odors. Throughout the dwelling shows that a thorough understanding of the many angles of happy home life counseled its design and erection.

Beginning today, The Washington Post display home at 5059 Sedgwick street will be open every day from 10 a. m. to 9 p. m. for four weeks. Representatives of the firm will be in constant attendance to show visitors through the dwelling and explain the many features of Miller-built homes. It is reached by driving out Massachusettes avenue; just beyond American University, then turn left on Fordham road to Sedgwick street, then right to 5059.

Concern Reports 17 Sales in August

Ending one of the most active summers in the past several years, Shannon & Luchs Co., reports settling of more than 17 sales during August. Sales were:

Premises 4124 Third street northwest, sold to Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Donaldson; ground on Good Hope road southeast, sold for Samuel Yochelson; 319 Kennedy street northwest, sold to Mr. and Mrs. F. Fischer; 321 Kennedy street northwest, sold for H. J. Marceron; 323 Kennedy street northwest, sold to E. L. Birkle; Twenty-fifth and E streets northwest, sold for Riggs National Bank; two lots on 15th street and Brentwood road northeast, sold for E. C. Hammer; 616 Leland street, Chevy Chase, Md., sold to Mr. and Mrs. George A. Patrick.

Three lots on Conduit road northwest, sold for W. G. Gardiner and J. H. Dean; 410 Shepherd street, Chevy Chase, Md., sold to Mrs. S. A. Smith; ground at rear of 36 Winston drive, Bethesda, Md., sold to Mrs. C. McK. Ashbrook; lot on Oliver street, Chevy Chase, Md., sold for Chevy Chase Land Co.; 440 Delafield place northwest, sold to J. H. Barnett; 52 Madison street northwest, sold for Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Clark; 709½ and 711 C street northeast, sold to M. Q. and T. L. Coates; 2812 Thirty-eighth street northwest, sold to Mr. and Mrs. E. K. Burlew.

HOLC Home Sales Interest Reduced

Beginning tomorrow, all homes owned by Home Owners' Loan Corporation will be sold on contracts carrying a 4½ per cent interest rate instead of the previous rate of 5 per cent. Otherwise, HOLC terms will remain the same, according to William E. Foster, district manager of HOLC. Homes can be purchased for down payments as low as 10 per cent, with the balance amortized over periods as long as 15 years.

"This means one of the best contracts home buyers ever have been offered," said Mr. Foster, in part. "It means that a home seeker with a comparatively small amount of cash can pay off a $3,000 balance in 15 years by monthly payments of $22.95. A $4,000 loan can be liquidated at the rate of $30.60 per month—$7.65 for each $1,000 of his loan.

"Under the regulations of the corporation, homes can be sold only at fair market prices; none of them will be 'sacrificed' to make a sale. But they all represent sound values and most of them have been repaired and modernized to place them in the best possible shape to attract home seekers."

House of Future Will Open Today

Official opening of National Broadcasting Co.'s "House of the Future," at Massachusetts avenue and Jamestown road, one block beyond the District line, in Maryland, occurs today, it was announced yesterday by Kenneth H. Berkeley, general mangaer of the WRC and WMAL.

A thousand invitations have been sent to Government officials and prominent Washingtonians to attend the preview this morning from 9:30 until noon, when the general public is invited. It is estimated that approximately 200,000 persons will view the structure exemplifying the type of dwelling people will own five years hence. L. E. Breuninger & Sons, Inc., of this city, is the builder.

Since ground breaking ceremonies for the house last May, WRC and WMAL listeners have been advised of the develpoment in its construction. Mary Mason, director of the FRC Home Forum, will act as hostess at the official opening.

The restful atmosphere of this lovely garden, designed for outdoor living, is enhanced by the unusual privacy achieved with the use of high stone walls and stately Douglas fir trees. The lovely garden house with fireplace, high vaulted ceiling and huge oak timbers is a heavenly place for relaxation and entertainment of guests. The picture shows the large picture window of the living room and the huge circular bay window of the dining room which almost bring the garden into the house. The flagstone terrace under a grove of pine trees is an alluring spot with an appealing view of the Virginia hills (seen over the garden house). A high walled service yard (see at left) prevents detraction from the beauty of the garden.

The fine proportions of the house combined with a distinctive type of stone work creates a most dignified and restful charm. In addition to the large dining and living rooms there is a spacious entrance hall, a delightful library with fireplace, powder room, butler's pantry with sink and well equipped kitchen on the first floor, four exceptionally large bedrooms with spacious cedar closets on second floor; two large rooms and bath on the third floor suitable for family use, one of which is exceptionally roomy and has a huge picture window overlooking the Virginia hills. Fine recreation room, air-conditioning heating, adequate servants' quarters, two-car attached garage.

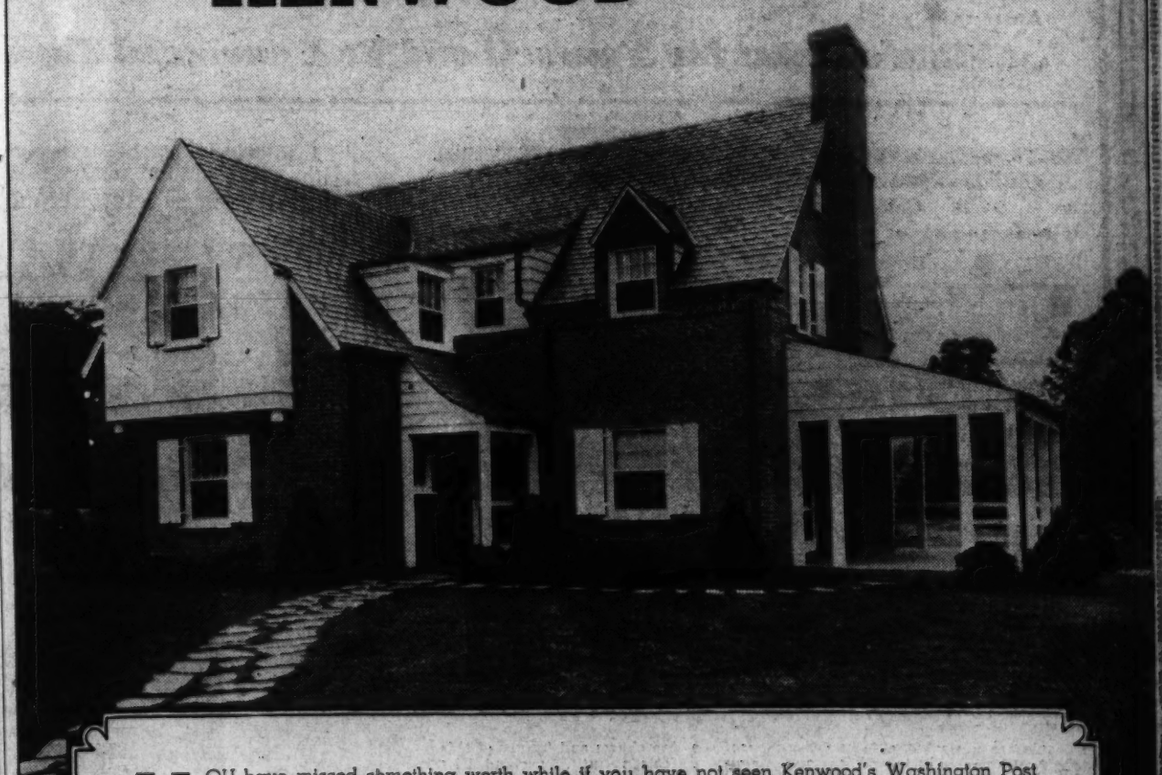
KENWOOD



YOU have missed something worth while if you have not seen Kenwood's Washington Post Display Home. We could write volumes about this house, but we suggest that you personally inspect it as it is an outstanding value. The price will agreeably surprise you.

Commodity prices are rising, therefore cost of construction is rapidly increasing. A home purchased on today's market cannot be reproduced for the same price a few months hence.

Built of the finest materials by skilled craftsmen on a corner lot containing almost 1-3 of an acre, this home is just a short walk to the Kenwood Golf and Country Club where golf, tennis, swimming, or just a social hour with friends can be enjoyed by its fortunate purchaser and his family. See it over this week-end. Homes and homesites sold only to approved purchasers.

Interesting Residences Invite Homeseekers' Attention

Arrangement Of Home Site Important

Attractive Home Presented in Northwest Section

Laying out of home surroundings in the established residential neighborhoods of Washington has been carefully considered by builders and architects separately and with respect to individual cases. They have decided, and often wisely so, that if the rear yard of the home lends itself to treatment that is where the living area should be and for this reason the garage, they have found, is often better alongside the house, either built as part of it or connected by a covered passage.

In the surroundings of choice neighborhoods, flower gardens have been included in the scheme and the matter of shade and view has been considered. By view is not necessarily meant a long vista. An interesting angle of the house, a graceful clump of trees or shrubs, a corner with a rose-bed are just as much to be taken advantage of as a distant view of the hills, forest or water. A smart hedge, or even a trim wall, is a charming addition to these intimate scenes and contributes greatly to privacy.

In many of the established home sections of the District of Columbia, grounds and houses have been considered as one and each has been planned to supplement the other. In building such projects, the developers, by tying them to the living areas of the house and surrounding them with some forms of protecting screens, have made their yards as attractive and cozy as the rooms in the dwellings.

In one of the select localities is a very modern yet inexpensive residence which may be acquired on terms to suite the individual requirements. Its spacious floor plans include a cloak closet in the entrance hall, large living and dining rooms, kitchen and first floor lavatory. It has three bedrooms and two baths upstairs and its basement has fireplace and space for recreation rooms.

Located at 6340 Thirty-first place northwest, this home has air-conditioned heat and latest equipment. Designed by Arthur L. Anderson and built by Muhleman & Kayhoe, it is presented by the main office of Wesley Buchanan.

Planning of Home Sites Progressing

Noteworthy progress in planning, improved use of materials and better business management are all making strides giving better values in return for the home building dollar. The market for new homes will be enlarged in direct ratio to the success with which the building industry is able to find ways and means of giving better values to its home offerings.

People are living out of doors now more than ever before. As transportation is becoming more convenient, it is possible for the home owner to go about and make comparisons between his neighborhood and home and those of other communities. This results in better planning of home grounds. It is not uncommon to see the room arrangement turned about so that instead of facing the street with the living rooms, these rooms look out upon a garden development.

One house with lovely surroundings is located at 4800 River road. Everything desired in a dwelling has been included in this distinguished new house of colonial treatment. It contains six spacious rooms, first-floor den or breakfast room, screened porch adjoining dining room, large living room opening on flagstone terrace, master bedroom with sun deck and unsually planned recreation room.

Among its fine structural and equipment features are air-conditioned oil heat, slate roof, copper water pipes. Its delightful setting is an attractive corner lot, 70 by 150 feet in dimension. Its location is one of the very finest in the northwest residential territory. To reach this showing drive out Wisconsin avenue to River road, a short distance past the District line.

New Development Adjoins Parkway

Answering the request for moderate-cost dwellings in a community favored with park areas, a project possessing these qualifications has been begun in the Southeast section of the city. It is located in Minnesota avenue southeast just north of Pennsylvania avenue, adjoining several Federal parkways and the golf links of Anacostia Park's recreation center.

The project called Lyndale, embraces a wooded reservation with valley and small stream running through the center which have been purchased by the Federal Government for inclusion in the Southeast Washington parkway system. Besides this, the development is only four blocks away from Anacostia Park, one of the largest in the District, with 425 acres of wooded hills.

A parking and shopping establishment has been planned at the main entrance of the site. Homes in this enterprise are erected attractively and grouped harmoniously. They are remarkable for their comfortable planning and low maintenance cost. The operation was originated and is sponsored by J. Wesley Buchanan. The first section of 43 homes has been sold and more than 18 in the second have been purchased.

Market for Low-Cost Home Broadening

In the metropolitan area there are numerous choice neighborhoods where homes may now be secured at most moderate cost. Planning has played an important part in the development of these sections where the builders have been motivated by an effort to secure a close harmony between the houses and their surroundings. Nature and scope of the settings guided them in determining the types of dwellings they erected.

They have employed the services of qualified craftsmen in effecting these details and the casts involved produced stability of construction, economy in maintainance and pleasing arrangement of grounds.

Of this type are 14 distinguished new homes built by Muhleman & Kayhoe on Meadow lane in nearby Virginia. Presented by the Virginia office of J. Wesley Buchanan, they may be seen by driving over Memorial Bridge and out Lee boulevard to Hillwood, then out Hillwood avenue to Meadow lane and left one block.

Six of these houses have already been sold. Each contains a beautiful living room with fireplace, two large bedrooms, model kitchen, tiled bath, full attic and basement.

Purchase of Home Is Good Investment

Colonial Type Development Presented Today

Acquiring a home means establishment of a tangible savings or holding for either the retired couple or the growing family. These, while providing their own residences at a cost frequently much lower than rent, are creating increasingly valuable investments on which they can capitalize in adverse periods or improve in times of good fortune.

Arrangement of long-term loans for the home buyer and provision of monthly payments caring for principal, insurance, interest and taxes, induce greater consideration of a comparison of the home cost and monthly payment of rent. Inviting such a comparison are homes presented today which form ideal habitations for a couple or a small family.

On a shady, tree-lined street, and atop gracefully terraced lots, these handsome residences are noteworthy by reason of their comfortable floor planning and convenient room arrangement. They represent fine construction in addition to individual design of the true Colonial period, and their numerous unusual features insure soundest return for the buyers' investment. All the refinements that today's purchaser expects to find in the moderate cost home of the present, have been provided in these dwellings.

Erected by Muhleman & Kayhoe, a veteran partnership of home builders and noted for their authentic Colonial reproductions, these residences were designed by Arthur L. Anderson and are presented by J. Wesley Buchanan at a price and on terms that will reduce potential purchasers' rent bills substantially. To inspect these exceptional values, which are open to visitation daily and on Sundays, drive out Wisconsin avenue northwest to Reservoir road; then west on Reservoir road to Thirty-ninth street, then north to 1953 Thirty-ninth street northwest, which is the exhibit residence of this group in which ten already have been sold.

Inspection of these homes will emphasize that there is more to home ownership than can be described or weighed in economic terms.

Urban Home Building Seen At 9-Year Top

Home Loan Bank Heads Expect Billion-Dollar Year Currently

City residential construction will reach a 9-year peak this year—the first "billion dollar year" since 1930—and only unexpected adverse influences resulting from the war can prevent expanding activity in the future.

This was the consensus expressed by the presidents of the 12 Federal Home Loan banks following conclusion of their semi-annual conference with officials of the Federal Home Loan Bank here. They added that home seekers are offered the best market in the country's history—lower interest rates and more liberal terms—with an unperalled supply of funds available for home financing.

The presidents, representing nearly 4,000 thrift and home-financing institutions with assets of more than $4,600,000,000, made it clear that they did not forsee any developments from the war which would hamper the home-financing and construction industry. War influences, they conceded, might more easily bring a more general employment and larger payrolls which would boom industry. Only some unforeseen developments, they stressed, could halt expansion already definitely under way.

Increases Are General

Increased construction, increased lending activity, increase in rental values, increasing sales of real estate—these were reported unanimously from every section of the United States. Through July of this year, new dwelling units in cities of 10,000 or more population represented expenditures of $595,669,000, an increase of almost 40 per cent over the first seven months of last year. A continuation of that trend, the bank presidents pointed out, would result in total such residential construction for 1939 considerably above $1,000,000,000, as compared to $779,802,800 last year.

Optimistic reports were made to the bank board by the presidents of all 12 banks on activities among their own member institutions, chiefly savings, building and loan associations. Private funds are flowing into their institutions at an unprecedented rate, they declare, promising availability of larger funds for home-financing purposes than in any time in the history of the Federal Home Loan Bank System. At the same time, the presidents forecast declining activity by commercial banks in the home-financing field, because of increasing investment possibilities elsewhere—with a consequent increase in opportunities for institutions devoting their activities specifically to investments in homes.

Renewed public confidence in the values of home ownership, as the result of lower interest rates and long-term amortized loans—direct reduction loans which provide for the liquidation of mortgages in a definite, specific period—was cited by the presidents as assuring an increasing volume of building in the near future. The same confidence was credited with the increased private investment in home-financing institutions, which has allowed the retirement of Government investments on a large scale.

Loans Show Gains

Amount of loans made by the member savings and loan associations of the bank system, was offered by the bank presidents as proof of the value of the system, established by Congress seven years ago to provide a credit reservior for home-financing agencies. Member associations loaned $431,894,000 in the first seven months of 1939, an increase of 24.5 per cent over the same period in 1938. Member institutions, the presidents pointed out, still have a potential credit reserve of more than a billion and a half dollars to draw upon to meet home-financing demands.

Presidents of the 12 Federal Home Loan Banks are: Walter H. Neaves, Boston; George L. Bliss, New York; Ralph H. Richards, Pittsburgh; O. K. LaRoque, Winston-Salem; Walter D. Shultz, Cincinnati; Fred T. Greene, Indianapolis; A. R. Gardner, Chicago; Robert J. Richardson, Des Moines; B. H. Wooten, Little Rock; C. A. Sterling, Topeka; Frank H. Johnson, Portland, and M. M. Hurford, Los Angeles.

Linoleum Is Practical Surface for Sink Tops

Linoleum, once confined chiefly to floors, has branched out in the home and is now regarded as an attractive and practical surface for sink tops and drain boards. Because of its resiliency, it reduces clatter and retards breakage of dishes.

On drainboards or other areas where water is spilled or splashed, the success of the installation depends almost entirely upon the quality of workmanship in making the seams and edges tight and waterproof.

$5,235,000 Value of D. C. August Liens

Home mortgages recorded in the District in August by all types of home-financing groups totaled 1,198 and amounted to $5,235,000, officials of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board reported.

By lenders the figures were: Saving and loan associations, 491, $2,275,000; insurance companies, 50, $323,000; banks and trust companies, 75, $425,000; individuals, 315, $900,000; others, 267, $1,312,000. Total figures were the equivalent of $10.76 per capita on non-farm property.

Monthly studies of such recordings are made by the board's division of research and statistics with the cooperation of O. K. LaRoque, president of the Federal Home Loan Bank of Winston-Salem, N. C., savings and loan executives; Mortgage Bankers' Association members, and the American Title Association.

Home mortgages recorded in Maryland cities and towns in August totaled 1,873 and amounted to $4,950,000. By lenders the figures were: Savings and loan associations, 919, $2,218,000; insurance companies, 41, $232,000; banks and trust companies, 234, $848,000; mutual savings banks, 28, $102,000; individuals, 512, $1,240,000; others, 139, $310,000. Total figures were the equivalent of $3.55 per capita (non-farm).

Home mortgages recorded in Virginia cities and towns in August totaled 2,970 and amounted to $8,208,000. By lenders the figures were: Savings and loan associations, 884, $2,324,000; insurance companies, 337, $1,508,000; banks and trust companies, 372, $1,135,000; individuals, 1,180, $2,598,000; others, 197, $643,000. Total figures were the equivalent of $5.58 per capita (non-farm).

New dwelling units constructed or projected in Virginia cities of 10,000 population or over in August numbered 208 and cost $835,600. These figures compare with 177 units costing $729,500 in August, 1938. Board statisticians based these figures on building permits reported to the United States Department of Labor.

Realtors to Visit Yellowstone Park

A special tour for delegates to the of the National Association of Real Estate Boards in Los Angeles, October 24 to 27, is scheduled to include a post-season visit to Yellowstone Park and a visit to Grand Coulee Dam, Washington, en route. Real estate men from Eastern cities will converge at chicago, October 14, and leave there at 9 o'clock that night on a "Yellowstone Park Special" over the Burlington Route and Northern Pacific Railway.

They will motor into Yellowstone Park from Gardiner, Mont., October 16, and spend the day viewing the world-famous hot spring localities, geyser basins and the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone River. Grand Coulee dam, the $200,000,000 world's largest hydro-electric project, will be visited October 18 in an auto sidetrip from Spokane, Washington.

The following day, Seattle Real Estate Board will join in showing the convention travelers the sights of Seattle. Portland, Oreg., and the Columbia River Highway will be viewed during an evening stopover the same day before the party proceeds southward to California.

Modernizing Assessments To Be Topic

National Group Lists Vital Subject for October Parley

Modernization of assessors' methods in valuation of properties for tax purposes will be a very important topic before the National Association of Real Estate Boards at its coming annual convention, to be held at the Biltmore Hotel, Los Angeles, October 24 to 27 inclusive. Such recent court decisions as that given in a test case in Denver emphasize the degree to which correct assessment procedure, even without any change in existing tax or assessment laws, can be a factor toward a more equitable tax situation for real estate, officers of the association remind.

In the Denver case, in which the court found the property in question to have been assessed at more than double its actual value, the decision was based on failure of the assessor to consider the income of the property as a factor in its valuation. Under present constitutional and statutory requirements, set up to insure a fair levy, the decision held, "Net income is the most important factor to consider in arriving at the actual value and potential market value of downtown business property." (The U. S. Supreme Court, in Great Northern Railway Co. vs Weeks, upheld consideration of net income as an important factor in the valuation of a property for tax purposes.)

New Techniques

The American Institute of Real Estate Appraisers, professional branch of the association in this field, has placed on its convention program for October 26 a discussion of new appraisal techniques for assessors. Needed State action in respect to appraisal procedure, and the whole question of State programs to give a more equitable tax situation for real estate, will come before a luncheon meeting of the national committee on real estate taxation, to be held October 24.

Harry S. Cutmore, former deputy assessor of Cook County, Ill., and author of the Assessor's Handbook for Cook County, will open the discussion of the American Institute of Real Estate Appraisers on new appraisal techniques for assessors. George H. Coffin, jr., Los Angeles, past president of the Los Angeles realty board, will lead a round-table to follow Mr. Cutmore's talk.

Corwin D. Edwards, member of the Industrial Committee of the National Resources Planning Board, chairman of the price committee of the central statistical board, economist who as special assistant to the U. S. Attorney General is director of housing investigation for the Department of Justice in its present movement against alleged abuses in the building field, will address general sessions of the coming annual convention.

Mr. Edwards will speak on Wednesday morning, October 25, on eliminating conditions which may be in the way of employment of the most efficient methods, or which may hamper use of whatever materials may be desirable for any given purpose. He is expected in this connection to make some analysis of actual typical building codes, and to discuss means for overcoming the hold-up effect of obsolete codes on construction methods and costs. Mr. Edwards was formerly assistant chief economist of the Federal Trade Commission.

In the detailed convention programs of the association's institutes and divisions, notable additional speakers announced include: Brokers division: Parker Webb, Boston vice chairman of the division, and David B. Simpson, Portland, Oreg., vice president of the association for the northwest region, and vice president of the institute of real estate management, who will present the views and practices of East vs. West on the leasing of commercial properties.

Donald T. Pomeroy, Syracuse, N. Y., vice president of the association for the Middle Atlantic region, and Ford S. Barrett, jr., of F. S. Barrett & Co., Spokane, Wash., who will lead a symposium on real estate selling in the East and West. Leroy Ackley, Los Angeles, chairman of the division, who with Stewart B. Matthews, Chicago, editor-in-chief of the division's bulletin service, will lead a panel discussion on present day real estate brokerage questions in which every speaker scheduled on the division's programs will participate.

Institute of real estate management: Louis Pfau, Los Angeles, will address the institute on how to obtain and retain management business. Robert C. Nordblom, Boston, will lead the round-table discussion to follow Mr. Pfau's talk. Morton G. Thalhimer, Richmond, Va., will lead a round-table on rental markets following the address already announced on this subject to be given by Chester A. Moores, vice president of Commonwealth, Inc., Portland, Oreg.

S. William Walstrum, Ridgewood, N. J., former president of the New Jersey Association of Real Estate Boards, will analyze the whole subject of fees for real estate management from the standpoint of professional services. C. Armel Nutter, president of the Nutter Mortgage Service, Camden, N. J., will lead a general discussion on reviving profits from older buildings through proper management programs. Initial speaker on this subject, already announced will be H. P. Holmes, of H. P. Holmes, Inc., Detroit, Mich.

Land developers and home builders division: P. H. Parrott, of the Frank L. McGuire Co., Portland, Oreg., vice chairman of the division, will talk on single-family homes and the essentials of selling method to meet actual consumer needs.

A national "Realtors Querio," with real estate quiz points of general interest, will be the closing feature of the convention. Chris R. Jones, Sacramento, president of the California real estate association, will act of Professor Query. First prize in the national contest will be $100 with the second and third prizes of $50 and $25 also to be awarded.

Contestants will be first prize winners of the various regional queries held by the association earlier in the year. Where a region's top man is unable to enter, the holder of the second place and then third, will be eligible to entry. Failing such entry for a region, the regional vice president will name the contestant for his section. The regional winners are as follows:

First prize winners are: Charles F. Curry, Kansas City, South Central Region; R. L. Mason, Indianapolis, Great Lakes Region; C. J. McKinney, jr., Brockton, Mass., New England Region; Gilmer Richardson, Memphis, Southeast Region; N. Shapiro, Jersey City, Central Atlantic Region; Ralph W. Watson, Spokane, Northwest Region; and Ed. Samp, Madison, North Central Region.

Second and third prize winners: South Central Region—A. W. Rhode, San Antonio, Tex., second; C. C. Ingle, Tulsa, Okla., third. Great Lakes Region—E. L. Marting, Akron, Ohio, second. New England Region—W. E. Sleeper, Concord, N. H., second; G. M. Allerton, Waterbury, Conn., third. Southeast Region—Olive Eden, Miami, Fla., second; Hoyt Boone, Greensboro, N. C., third. Central Atlantic Region—G. K. Preiser, East Orange, N. J., second; J. K. Leeds, Elizabeth, N. J., and Paul Pancake, Huntington, W. Va., tied for third. Northwest Region—George D. Poe, Takoma, Wash., second; Harry O. Bold, Seattle, Wash., third. North Central Region—Phillip P. Hayes, Milwaukee, Wis., second; J. R. Leverett, Council Bluffs, Iowa, third.

Closet Provides Wrapping Quarter

A convenient place to wrap up packages and keep all the paper and twine that is needed for that troublesome operation is a joy seldom realized in our homes. If you have a closet in which you can spare one end, set up a shelf about 30 inches from the floor and as deep as the space will allow.

On the wall on one side you may install a bracket to hold a roll of wrapping paper and at the other a place for the twine. If you save the paper and twine from packages received, provide a rack beneath the shelf, like a magazine rack, for the paper and a small drawer for the twine.

Another way of keeping the twine is to set up some hooks above the shelf to hang the pieces of twine over. This keeps them from getting tangled.

Veneer and Solid Wood Equally Important in Furniture

Former's Use Is Logical in Some Pieces

Permits Certain Decorative Effects And Matched Grains

By Elizabeth MacRae Boykin.

The average purchaser of furniture tosses off such words as "veneer" and "solid" very casually. But actually, how much do we really know about the merits and demerits of veneers versus solid wood construction? Yet some knowledge here is pretty important when we go to buy furniture.

Most of us grew up hearing such words as "solid mahogany" or "solid walnut" spoken with bated breath. Only to be jolted out of our complacency by profound explanations of how veneered pieces don't crack or warp and why it's actually stronger than solid.

The fact of the business is that you can't say that one type is better or worse than the other. There is shoddy solid wood furniture and shoddy veneers. Yet—in the famous Van Pelt sale in Philadelphia, a Chippendale style solid mahogany chair brought the record price of $33,000. While the Chippendale highboy with a crotch veneer front brought $44,000. Both were made in Philadelphia late in the eighteenth century and are regarded as superb of their kind. Veneers were used as far back as Egypt for that matter.

It comes down to this—solid wood construction has a definite reason for being selected in making a certain piece, while veneer is the logical construction for another piece. For either to be really good, they must begin with selected pieces of wood and be built with care and skill.

Three Reasons for Veneers

There are three specific reasons for veneers—one the fact that there is not an inexhaustible supply of the fine cabinet woods or interesting grains available for use in solid construction, and veneering, which uses up so much less wood, makes this supply go further and keeps the price on rare grains within practical reach.

The second reason for veneers is that certain decorative effects can be achieved with veneers that are impossible with solid wood: matched fronts for cabinets and drawers or figured tops for large tables are achieved by using layers of veneer cut from the same piece of wood, for, of course, no two different logs would have matching markings.

The third reason for veneers is that the intricately marked grains (cut crosswise of the wood) aren't as dependable and strong as the plainer wood grains (cut longwise of the wood) when used in a solid piece; whereas these same highly figured crotches, burls and swirls, cut in thin sheets and glued to a staunch straight grained piece of solid wood with the recently perfected waterproof and practically indestructable glues, become an integral part of the base wood and gain its solidarity and strength.

Another asset of veneer construction is that the layers can be put together in alternating right angles of the grain. Thus the strong lengthwise grain equalizes the weaker crosswise grain and so stabilizes the strength and dependability of the wood. Incidentally, the veneers of today are said to be better, in point of construction, than those of the eighteenth century because ours are thinner and so cling even more closely to the base wood than a thicker veneer wood. Also we have better ways of cutting veneer sheets now—in the eighteenth century they had to saw them.

Solid wood likewise has its place and points. It is essential for chairs to be of solid wood because the supporting structure is the big thing and that must be of staunch up and down grain wood rather than the more delicate cross grains or swirl grains. Table pedestals and legs of all pieces should be solid. Furthermore, it is usually essential for all carving to be done on solid wood.

And table tops, unless they're dependent on an intricate wood graining, are far easier and simpler to refinish and repair if they're of solid wood. (Though many tables are veneered for grain) chests, beds and other furniture of solid wood are sturdy and handsome in their straight grainings. Solid wood can take a lot more hard family wear than the veneers, not because the latter are less strong but because the refinishing of solid wood is so much simpler and surer.

Mahogany Plentiful

Generally speaking such cabinet woods as maple and birch are very plentiful and so are usually used in solid construction. Mahogany and walnut, being somewhat rarer and having so many intricate grains, are often used in veneer or plywood construction. Oak is plentiful but not suitable for many of the styles that have been in greatest vogue during recent years, nor is it suited to veneering. Gum and tupelo are common substitutes for the popular cabinet woods and are often used as bases for mahogany and walnut veneers.

The pitfalls that the purchaser must watch in buying are the cheap constructions using mahogany or walnut veneers on the drawer fronts only with sides and other exposed parts of the piece of an inferior wood stained to look like the front. Then too, showy furniture at a low price is apt to be a veneering job that won't hold up long.

Today, there happens to be a large enough amount of mahogany available to provide plenty of straight grain solid mahogany furniture at reasonable cost. A simpler piece of solid mahogany is a better buy than a cheap veneer where the money has all gone on doggy ornament. On the other hand, there are a lot of solid mahogany chairs on the market today that are of a very inferior quality of wood. The best mahogany has a fine grain—the poorer qualities have a coarse grain.

But you, the purchaser, must accept the economic fact that you can't get the best for the least cost—good woods in either solid or veneer construction are offered in all the leading stores at prices well within reason. But they can't be sold for nothing—and very low-priced furniture isn't often satisfactory. Better buy fewer pieces and have them of more dependable quality.

'No Blackout Of Building,' Says Editorial

Chicago.—"What will the war do to building? How fast will prices rise? and, Is a home a good buy now?" are three timely questions answered in an editorial survey in the American Builder, under the cheering title, "No Building Blackout Here."

"The first fact of importance for building men to consider," American Builder editors declare, in part, "is that when the first World War broke out in 1914 the building industry was in a declining market. For several years construction had been lagging and the 12 months previous had seen a sharp drop. In spite of the fact that when war was declared the stock market closed for five months and United States business for a time came almost to a standstill, building volume was not materially lessened. It leveled off the first few months, the decline was stopped, and by the end of the first year construction had turned up.

"This time we are in a rising building market with a definite shortage of homes. The stock market has spurted upwards at once—and a rising stock market has always been an aid to home construction. The American banking system today is strong. Business in general is better prepared for war—psychologically and otherwise. The anticipated war demand for American goods will come at a time when business indices are moving upward. The result should be a sharp upturn in business of all kinds—not just in war materials. It is a natural conclusion, therefore, that better business, more wages, higher incomes and higher market values will have a favorable effect on home building.

"Roy Wenzlick, president of Real Estate Analysis, Inc., speaking before the National Association of Woodwork Jobbers in Chicago a few days ago, said, 'If you are going to build a house, now is the time to do it.' November and December should show good construction gains, he declared, and predicted that the first six months of 1940 will be good. After that, rapidly advancing building costs will affect the rising volume, he indicated.

"There has been much loose talk about rising building costs. If the war continues there will eventually be a considerable rise. Opinion differs as to the extent of rise possible. Wenzlick points out that building costs advanced 218 per cent in the six-year period after the start of the first World War, and implies that a similar rise may take place this time. On the other hand, Roger Finkbine, president of the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association, has pledged the 100 per cent co-operation of the entire retail lumber industry to oppose any unjustifiable increase in items used in home building, thereby jeopardizing the recent gains in low-cost home construction.

"One powerful argument that builders and realtors can use to effective advantage today is that in a world full of uncertainty and confusion the average citizen will find, more than ever before, that a home of his own is the best and safest form of investment. No matter what happens, Mr. John Citizen has to have a place to live, and in a home of his own he is more secure against rising costs than in a rented house or an apartment where rents have already turned sharply up. With the possibility of inflation ahead the home owner with a long-term mortgage stands to profit. He can now obtain a 20 or 25-year mortgage with a fixed monthly charge that is the lowest in the Nation's history. The purchase of a home on such terms is the best possible hedge against inflation that the average citizen can make."

Clogged Gutters Cause Roof Leaks

Clogged gutters cause water to back up under the shingles past the metal flashing and leaks result. Now that the leaves are off the trees, gutters should be cleaned of all accumulated dirt and rubbish so that rain water may pass freely down the leaders.

Besides, clogged gutters will freeze and often burst the metal and cause considerable damage. While cleaning the gutters look for possible cracks and repair any you may find.

Home Building Now Cushioned Against War

Decline Not Likely In Next Few Months, Magazine Claims

The second World War will not bring a decline in residential building during the next few months because the building industry's economic background is much sounder today than in 1914, the Architectural Forum magazine declares.

In a special article on building the magazine points out that while in wartime 25 years ago and today, the industry cannot entirely escape war influences, "nothing can prevent 1939 from crossing the finish line as the best building year of this decade."

"There seems ample reason for soundly conceived construction planned for this winter or next spring," the magazine states. "To date reports from all over the country indicate that is precisely what is taking place. Where building is matched to the market chances are excellent that the market will be there to take it.

"Contrary to general conceptions, building did not go into a tailspin during 1914-18 period. In fact, the level of total construction in the armistice year of 1918 was 55 per cent higher than in 1914. And this advance in total construction took place despite the facts (1) that the economic background behind building in 1914 was far from healthy, and (2) that residential construction was 30 per cent lower at the end of the war period.

War Not Wholly To Blame

"The general downward course of home building in 1915-18 cannot be blamed solely on the war," the magazine explains. "It was already on the way down when war was declared. Thus, home building began downward through 1915. Then it again worked up until the United States entered the war in 1917.

"However, it was not the operation of any natural economic laws that forced residential construction down in that year. It was the establishment of priority orders for verious essential materials by the War Industries Board. Building that was not necessary to national defense was discouraged. Private building was curtailed, but the decreased activity was more than offset by increased expenditures for industrial construction.

"But one of the important differences between building's economic background in Word War I and today is that during the eight years prior to 1914 home building had been averaging about 480,000 dwelling units at an annual expenditure in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000. Even before the war came it had oversupplied its market, production slackened, rents started down, the rate of foreclosure started up.

"Today," the publication points out, "after several depression years of subnormal building when annual home production hits levels as low as 62,000 dwelling units ($271,800,000 in expenditures), the United States has an accumulated housing deficit estimated at 2,000,000 dwelling units. The market is far from supplied, production is on the upswing, rents are steady, the foreclosure rate is decreasing.

No "Controls" Then

"Other important differences between 1914 and 1939 lie further back in building's economic background. In 1914 the United States did not even dream of the many 'controls' which government now has over markets, prices, shipping, finances—to name but a few. Some of these 'controls' directly affect building in its reaction to World War II.

"In 1914 the Federal Home Loan Bank System was non-existent. Today, thanks to this well-established agency, the home mortgage business may be entirely divorced from the Nation's commercial credit structure. If commercial banks desert the mortgage market en masse in favor of industrial 'war baby' investments (an unlikely step), the FHLB system can supply home building with most of the money it needs to carry on a stable program.

"In 1914 the FHA had not been discovered,' and the long-term amortized mortgage, now universally used, was rare. Present day 'easy' financing, even assuming an upward revision of interest rates, makes home buying today not only more attractive but vastly more possible to thousands of families.

"Although building's economic background is vastly different from that behind World War I, the industry cannot entirely escape current war influences in which inflation will play the No. 1 role," the magazine states. "Reasonably, building may look for a cycle something like this:

"General business improves as belligerents and neutrals rely increasingly upon the United States for materials and equipment.

"Foreign trade increases as belligerents cease supplying world markets.

"Increased demand upon United States markets boosts commodity prices—building materials included.

"Employment increases, wage rates go up—building labor included.

"Mortgage interest rates advance in step with Government bond yield—the trend is already apparent.

"Increased material and labor prices up the cost of construction; residential and commercial construction slow down.

"Decreased residential construction puts more pressure on the housing shortage.

"A more acute housing shortage lifts rents and values of residential properties.

"If rents and values go high enough, it again becomes profitable to build at the higher material and labor cost; residential construction again picks up.

"Unfortunately, the picture may not compose as easily as all that," the magazine declares, "but certainly nothing can prevent 1939 from crossing the finish line as the best building year of this decade."

Screens Should Be Fitted Before Painting

Window screens should be fitted before they are painted. If this is not done, it is often found that when the paint planes away through raising and lowering there will be sufficient space between the bottom of the screen and the sill to allow moisture to enter.

Shower Stalls Makes 2nd Bath Possible

The "second" bath in a small home is often a desirable thing, but it frequently offers a problem because of lack of space. One possible solution is elimination of the tub and installation of a shower stall.

A complete bathroom with shower in place of tub, can be contained in a space as small as 5 feet square with favorable window arrangement.

Furnishing of the exhibit residence by Hutchison's, Inc., (pictures by Venable's) is extremely effective. The den, or library, just across the hall from the living room, is furnished with leather pieces in a wine brown, a deep sofa for luxurious lounging and a large chair to match. The desk used is particularly lovely. It is kidney-shaped with inlaid handtooled leather top and finished on all exposed sides. Indirect reading lamps are placed near the sofa and chair and a small brass lamp is used on the desk. Over the desk is a handsome picture, and an end table and smoker complete the ensemble.

Walls in Pastel Rose

Upstairs on the right of the hall is a charming room furnished for a young girl. Walls are finished in a pastel rose and the popular blonde maple streamline furniture is used. The sleek lines are as modern as tomorrow and the large mushroom knobs are among the latest in design. A large chest of drawers, double bed and low vanity, bench and mirror are the major pieces. The boudoir chair is distinctive. It has modern lines and is covered in a Dubonnet rayon fabric having small eggshell stripes running through it, being finished with a heavy eggshell rope fringe which reaches to the floor. A room-size broadloom rug in pale Nile green forms the floor covering.

Next is the boy's room which has been done in rugged maple pieces. These are sturdily built and will withstand hardest wear. They have been fashioned by expert workmen to resemble old originals which have had the edges and corners worn by time and use. Pieces are Early American with a Dutch motif. Those used will serve two boys, twin beds, night table, large chest of drawers and large dresser and mirror. Reflecting the color scheme, against a pale green wallpaper, are the hooked rugs and boudoir chair with gay flowers against a black ground.

The Post Display Home and Kenwood may be reached by three routes. One is out Connecticut avenue to Chevy Chase Circle, and west on Grafton street, through Somerset. Another is out Wisconsin avenue northwest, to Dorset avenue, through Somerset. A third is out Connecticut or Wisconsin avenues to Bradley lane and west on Bradley lane to Kenwood.

Well Is Suitable To Condition Air

Wherever a good supply of well water is available summer air conditioning is possible. And it need not be a very deep well, either. Water at 55 degrees or even higher will give good cooling and a certain amount of dehumidification.

All that is necessary is a well with sufficient water at a low enough temperature, a pump, coils, a blower, a duct or two, and an available supply of electricity and you can be as cool as you like. The size and extent of the equipment will depend, of course, on the size of the house, the available water supply, the relative temperature, and—most important—the amount of insulation in the house.

The cost of insulation will vary with the extent of the work required in drilling the well. But under normal conditions it should not be prohibitive even for the average house of 6 or 8 rooms. The cost of operation, too, should be relatively small for a reasonable lowering of temperature and dehumidification. And the water need not be lost. It is under pressure and may be used for irrigation or may be sprinkled over the roof, thus adding much to the cooling process.

Storage Space Vital in Home

There should be ample storage space in a home in order to adequately provide for the proper keeping of articles not in immediate use.

Bedroom and coat closets used chiefly for hanging space should be not less than 1 foot 10 inches in depth. Linen closets should be about 16 to 18 inches in depth.

While it is impossible to fix a rule for the amount of closet space that will be universally applicable, it is advisable to have at least one closet for each bedroom, a closet for linen, and one in which to hang hats and coats. Outer garments are sometimes damp; consequently, the coat closet should be near the entrance door so that water and mud are not spread through the dwelling.

Asbestos Resists Fire

In finishing the attic of the home the owner may increase the fire resistance by installing some form of asbestos paper between the subflooring and finish flooring.

Hidden Radiators Boon to Designers

Recessed radiators have solved many of the architect's and decorator's problems. The entire wall is now available for furniture; where the radiator grilles are used, tables or low desks or chairs may be placed without interfering with the heating of the room or detriment to the furniture. Window sills may be as low as one likes, for it is not necessary to place the radiators under the windows to conserve wall space, and draperies are not soiled by the constant flow of dusty air.

The actual size of the radiator may be cut down because the draft, created by the wall stacks in which the radiators are set, carries the heat away from the radiators faster and spreads the warmed air more evenly about the room.

Pierre Urges Mobilization Of Building

Industry Should Be Ready to Serve U. S. In Peace, War, He Says

Mobilization of America's building industry "to serve the Nation in peace or war" is urged by Edward D. Pierre, of Indianapolis, president of the Indiana Chapter of the American Institute of Architects. Delay in developing a program of preparedness would be "suicidal", declares Mr. Pierre, who explains that "it is highly important that the industry realize this need before the Government does."

"The building industry is unprepared to meet any emergency that might arise," Mr. Pierre says, in part. "It has little knowledge of its weakness or strength, its manpower and its physical resources. The surrounding dangers of increasing magnitude should be warning enough to the profession and the industry to prepare for any emergency that may present itself.

"The building industry is the nation's greatest normal peacetime industry. It must realize its greatness and importance to the nation. By virtue of its vastness it has a tremendous influence on national well-being. It has a public obligation and responsibility. A new order of relationship is needed. Every man in the industry should strive for solidarity. The forces of design, management, craftsmen and materials should be welded into a united front.

"The American Institute of Architects should accept the challenge of leadership and instigate plans for aggressive action that will protect not only the interests of the industry but the nation as well. No one can contemplate the effects of war, especially one the extent of which is unknown, but some if its ill effects can be curbed by concerted, intelligent action. It would be suicidal to wait for these effects. The industry should concentrate on a program of preparedness that will serve the nation in peace or war.

"How the European war will effect the profession of architecture or the building industry is yet problematical. There will be reactions, some based on fact and some on imagination and opportunity. We have the history of similar circumstances. The same laws of greed and predatory motives that existed in the past exist today."

Seize Cool of Night

Insulation engineers advise the home owner to "trap the cool of the night" by insulating the rooms and keeping them open during the night. As soon after sun-up as possible the house should be closed, trapping the cool night air.

Lighting Fixtures Need Attention

Design, location and number of lighting fixtures to be made part of a home should be given careful attention. There is a trend entirely from attached lighting fixtures, and where this is followed an ample number of wiring outlets must be provided to care for movable lighting devices.

Proper light distribution and the elimination of glare should be sought in the selection and location of lighting fixtures.

Fixtures must be structurally sound and attractive in appearance. Extreme styles of lighting fixtures decline rapidly in value. Thus, simplicity in design should be sought.

Green Proves Charming As Bedroom Color

A California country home in the Santa Monica foothills has a master bedroom decorated charmingly in green. The walls and ceiling are painted ivy green and the rug, draperies and bedspread are of the same color.

The bedside table of bleached wood holds white pottery lamps with green floral sprays, and white ivy leaves cut from silk are appliqued onto the bed hangings.

Side Porches Make Good Sun Parlors

With comparatively little remodeling and expense, seldom-used side and rear porches may be converted into sun parlors.

A glass-in sun room is often the most popular room in a home and can be used for flowers and often for a summer sleeping porch.

Veneer and Solid Wood Equally Important in Furniture

Former's Use Is Logical in Some Pieces

Permits Certain Decorative Effects And Matched Grains

By Elizabeth MacRae Boykin.

The average purchaser of furniture tosses off such words as "veneer" and "solid" very casually. But actually, how much do we really know about the merits and demerits of veneers versus solid wood construction? Yet some knowledge here is pretty important when we go to buy furniture.

Most of us grew up hearing such words as "solid mahogany" or "solid walnut" spoken with bated breath. Only to be jolted out of our complacency by profound explanations of how veneered pieces don't crack or warp and why it's actually stronger than solid.

The fact of the business is that you can't say that one type is better or worse than the other. There is shoddy solid wood furniture and shoddy veneers. Yet—in the famous van Pelt sale in Philadelphia, a Chippendale style solid mahogany chair brought the record price of $33,000. While the Chippendale highboy with a crotch veneer front brought $44,000. Both were made in Philadelphia late in the eighteenth century and are regarded as superb of their kind. Veneers were used as far back as Egypt for that matter.

It comes down to this—solid wood construction has a definite reason for being selected in making a certain piece, while veneer is the logical construction for another piece. For either to be really good, they must begin with selected pieces of wood and be built with care and skill.

Three Reasons for Veneers

There are three specific reasons for veneers—one the fact that there is not an inexhaustible supply of the fine cabinet woods or interesting grains available for use in solid construction, and veneering, which uses up so much less wood, makes this supply go further and keeps the price on rare grains within practical reach.

The second reason for veneers is that certain decorative effects can be achieved with veneers that are impossible with solid wood; matched fronts for cabinets and drawers or figured tops for large tables are achieved by using layers of veneer cut from the same piece of wood, for, of course, no two different logs would have matching markings.

The third reason for veneers is that the intricately marked grains (cut crosswise of the wood) aren't as dependable and strong as the plainer wood grains (cut longwise of the wood) when used in a solid piece; whereas these same highly figured crotches, burls and swirls, cut in thin sheets and glued to a staunch straight grained piece of solid wood with the recently perfected waterproof and practically indestructable glues, become an integral part of the base wood and gain its solidarity and strength.

Another asset of veneer construction is that the layers can be put together in alternating right angles of the grain. Thus the strong lengthwise grain equalizes the weaker crosswise grain and so stabilizes the strength and dependability of the wood. Incidentally, the veneers of today are said to be better, in point of construction, than those of the eighteenth century because ours are thinner and so cling even more closely to the base wood than a thicker veneer wood. Also we have better ways of cutting veneer sheets now—in the eighteenth century they had to saw them.

Solid wood likewise has its place and points. It is essential for chairs to be of solid wood because the supporting structure is the big thing and that must be of staunch up and down grain wood rather than the more delicate cross grains or swirl grains. Table pedestals and legs of all pieces should be solid. Furthermore, it is usually essential for all carving to be done on solid wood.

And table tops, unless they're dependent on an intricate wood graining, are far easier and simpler to refinish and repair if they're of solid wood. (Though many tables are veneered for grain) chests, beds and other furniture of solid wood are sturdy and handsome in their straight grainings. Solid wood can take a lot more hard family wear than the veneers, not because the latter are less strong but because the refinishing of solid wood is so much simpler and surer.

Mahogany Plentiful

Generally speaking such cabinet woods as maple and birch are very plentiful and so are usually used in solid construction. Mahogany and walnut, being somewhat rarer and having so many intricate grains, are often used in veneer or plywood construction. Oak is plentiful but not suitable for many of the styles that have been in greatest vogue during recent years, nor is it suited to veneering. Gum and tupelo are common substitutes for the popular cabinet woods and are often used as bases for mahogany and walnut veneers.

The pitfalls that the purchaser must watch in buying are the cheap constructions using mahogany or walnut veneers on the drawer fronts only with sides and other exposed parts of the piece of an inferior wood stained to look like the front. Then too, showy furniture at a low price is apt to be a veneering job that won't hold up long.

Today, there happens to be a large enough amount of mahogany available to provide plenty of straight grain solid mahogany furniture at reasonable cost. A simpler piece of solid mahogany is a better buy than a cheap veneer where the money has all gone on doggy ornament. On the other hand, there are a lot of solid mahogany chairs on the market today that are of a very inferior quality of wood. The best mahogany has a fine grain—the poorer qualities have a coarse grain.

But you, the purchaser, must accept the economic fact that you can't get the best for the least cost—good woods in either solid or veneer construction are offered in all the leading stores at prices well within reason. But they can't be sold for nothing—and very low-priced furniture isn't often satisfactory. Better buy fewer pieces and have them of more dependable quality.

'No Blackout Of Building,' Says Editorial

Chicago.—"What will the war do to building? How fast will prices rise? and, Is a home a good buy now?" are three timely questions answered in an editorial survey in the American Builder, under the cheering title, "No Building Blackout Here."

"The first fact of importance for building men to consider," American Builder editors declare, in part, "is that when the first World War broke out in 1914 the building industry was in a declining market. For several years construction had been lagging and the 12 months previous had seen a sharp drop. In spite of the fact that when war was declared the stock market closed for five months and United States business for a time came almost to a standstill, building volume was not materially lessened. It leveled off the first few months, the decline was stopped, and by the end of the first year construction had turned up.

"This time we are in a rising building market with a definite shortage of homes. The stock market has spurted upwards at once—and a rising stock market has always been an aid to home construction. The American banking system today is strong. Business in general is better prepared for war—psychologically and otherwise. The anticipated war demand for American goods will come at a time when business indices are moving upward. The result should be a sharp upturn in business of all kinds—not just in war materials. It is a natural conclusion, therefore, that better business, more wages, higher incomes and higher market values will have a favorable effect on home building.

"Roy Wenzlick, president of Real Estate Analysis, Inc., speaking before the National Association of Woodwork Jobbers in Chicago a few days ago, said, 'If you are going to build a house, now is the time to do it.' November and December should show good construction gains, he declared, and predicted that the first six months of 1940 will be good. After that, rapidly advancing building costs will affect the rising volume, he indicated.

"There has been much loose talk about rising building costs. If the war continues there will eventually be a considerable rise. Opinion differs as to the extent of rise possible. Wenzlick points out that building costs advanced 218 per cent in the six-year period after the start of the first World War, and implies that a similar rise may take place this time. On the other hand, Roger Finkbine, president of the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association, has pledged the 100 per cent co-operation of the entire retail lumber industry to oppose any unjustifiable increase in items used in home building, thereby jeopardizing the recent gains in low-cost home construction.

"One powerful argument that builders and realtors can use to effective advantage today is that in a world full of uncertainty and confusion the average citizen will find, more than ever before, that a home of his own is the best and safest form of investment. No matter what happens, Mr. John Citizen has to have a place to live, and in a home of his own he is more secure against rising costs than in a rented house or an apartment where rents have already turned sharply up. With the possibility of inflation ahead the home owner with a long-term mortgage stands to profit. He can now obtain a 20 or 25-year mortgage with a fixed monthly charge that is the lowest in the Nation's history. The purchase of a home on such terms is the best possible hedge against inflation that the average citizen can make."

Clogged Gutters Cause Roof Leaks

Clogged gutters cause water to back up under the shingles past the metal flashing and leaks result. Now that the leaves are off the trees, gutters should be cleaned of all accumulated dirt and rubbish so that rain water may pass freely down the leaders.

Besides, clogged gutters will freeze and often burst the metal and cause considerable damage. While cleaning the gutters look for possible cracks and repair any you may find.

Home Building Now Cushioned Against War

Decline Not Likely In Next Few Months, Magazine Claims

The second World War will not bring a decline in residential building during the next few months because the building industry's economic background is much sounder today than in 1914, the Architectural Forum magazine declares.

In a special article on building the magazine points out that while in wartime 25 years ago and today, the industry cannot entirely escape war influences, "nothing can prevent 1939 from crossing the finish line as the best building year of this decade."

"There seems ample reason for soundly conceived construction planned for this winter or next spring," the magazine states. "To date reports from all over the country indicate that is precisely what is taking place. Where building is matched to the market chances are excellent that the market will be there to take it.

"Contrary to general conceptions, building did not go into a tailspin during 1914-18 period. In fact, the level of total construction in the armistice year of 1918 was 55 per cent higher than in 1914. And this advance in total construction took place despite the facts (1) that the economic background behind building in 1914 was far from healthy, and (2) that residential construction was 30 per cent lower at the end of the war period.

War Not Wholly To Blame

"The general downward course of home building in 1915-18 cannot be blamed solely on the war," the magazine explains. "It was already on the way down when war was declared. Thus, home building began downward through 1915. Then it again worked up until the United States entered the war in 1917.

"However, it was not the operation of any natural economic laws that forced residential construction down in that year. It was the establishment of priority orders for various essential materials by the War Industries Board. Building that was not necessary to national defense was discouraged. Private building was curtailed, but the decreased activity was more than offset by increased expenditures for industrial construction.

"But one of the important differences between building's economic background in Word War I and today is that during the eight years prior to 1914 home building had been averaging about 480,000 dwelling units at an annual expenditure in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000. Even before the war came it had oversupplied its market, production slackened, rents started down, the rate of foreclosure started up.

"Today," the publication points out, "after several depression years of subnormal building when annual home production hits levels as low as 62,000 dwelling units ($271,800,000 in expenditures), the United States has an accumulated housing deficit estimated at 2,000,000 dwelling units. The market is far from supplied, production is on the upswing, rents are steady, the foreclosure rate is decreasing.

No "Controls" Then

"Other important differences between 1914 and 1939 lie further back in building's economic background. In 1914 the United States did not even dream of the many 'controls' which government now has over markets, prices, shipping, finances—to name but a few. Some of these 'controls' directly affect building in its reaction to World War II.

"In 1914 the Federal Home Loan Bank System was non-existent. Today, thanks to this well-established agency, the home mortgage business may be entirely divorced from the Nation's commercial credit structure. If commercial banks desert the mortgage market en masse in favor of industrial 'war baby' investments (an unlikely step), the FHLB system can supply home building with most of the money it needs to carry on a stable program.

"In 1914 the FHA had not been discovered,' and the long-term amortized mortgage, now universally used, was rare. Present day 'easy' financing, even assuming an upward revision of interest rates, makes home buying today not only more attractive but vastly more possible to thousands of families.

"Although building's economic background is vastly different from that behind World War I, the industry cannot entirely escape current war influences in which inflation will play the No. 1 role," the magazine states. "Reasonably, building may look for a cycle something like this:

"General business improves as belligerents and neutrals rely increasingly upon the United States for materials and equipment.

"Foreign trade increases as belligerents cease supplying world markets.

"Increased demand upon United States markets boosts commodity prices—building materials included.

"Employment increases, wage rates go up—building labor included.

"Mortgage interest rates advance in step with Government bond yield—the trend is already apparent.

"Increased material and labor prices up the cost of construction; residential and commercial construction slow down.

"Decreased residential construction puts more pressure on the housing shortage.

"A more accute housing shortage lifts rents and values of residential properties.

"If rents and values go high enough, it again becomes profitable to build at the higher material and labor cost; residential construction again picks up.

"Unfortunately, the picture may not compose as easily as all that," the magazine declares, "but certainly nothing can prevent 1939 from crossing the finish line as the best building year of this decade."

Screens Should Be Fitted Before Painting

Window screens should be fitted before they are painted. If this is not done, it is often found that when the paint planes away through raising and lowering there will be sufficient space between the bottom of the screen and the sill to allow moisture to enter.

Shower Stalls Makes 2nd Bath Possible

The "second" bath in a small home is often a desirable thing, but it frequently offers a problem because of lack of space. One possible solution is elimination of the tub and installation of a shower stall.

A complete bathroom with shower in place of tub, can be contained in a space as small as 5 feet square, with favorable window arrangement.

Display Home Near Kenwood Sports Center

Golf, Tennis Areas As Well as Pool Are Close By

A Washington Post Display Home, now open at 712 Dorset avenue, in Kenwood, Md., has as its locale, a neighborhood exemplifying that congenial community life on which the American social structure so successfully rests. It is a development built around a clubhouse, recreational and social facilities of which promote a happy existence for residents.

Distinguished Colonial architecture marks this show home which in floor arrangement follows the center hall planning of that period. Of brick construction, the first floor of the residence affords space for a large living room with living porch adjoining, bright dining room, ultra-modern kitchen, library and adjacent full bath.

On the second floor are three fine bedrooms and two complete baths, and basement space has been apportioned for a recreation room with fireplace and lavatory, maid's room and bath, with a generous amount of room for the laundry unit. The setting of this home is a corner lot, 14,000 square feet in dimensions.

Near Large Clubhouse

The Kenwood community of the Kennedy-Chamberlin Development Co., demonstrates in the Washington metropolitan area that ideal which has been realized successfully in other cities—nearness to a large clubhouse or community center. Kenwood Golf and Country Club, nucleus of the district, serves as a meeting place for dwellers in an attractive subdivision containing more than $1,500,000 worth of homes.

As the development has grown, the club has continued in improvement. Its membership is increasing regularly and the original building, including ballroom, lounge, women's party room, dining rooms and lockers, has been enlarged to provide additional lockers and showers.

Outside, the club property embraces a golf course, tennis courts, skeet range and a large, beautifully appointed swimming pool. With underwater lighting, this pool is filled with filtered water, refiltered and purified every eight hours. City water is run into the pool and treated with chlorine, alum, copper sulphate and soda to insure its purity. Conveniently near are lockers and showers with dressing rooms for women.

Residents of Kenwood are members of the club, which has one of the finest golf courses in the country and on which the National Capital Open tournament has been played annually. Development of the club-community has given impetus to the expansion of the section and more persons are selecting this progressive vicinity as an ideal place to live.

Furnishing of the exhibit residence by Hutchison's, Inc., (pictures by Venable's) is extremely effective. The den, or library, just across the hall from the living room, is furnished with leather pieces in a wine brown, a deep sofa for luxurious lounging and a large chair to match. The desk used is particularly lovely. It is kidney-shaped with inlaid handtooled leather top and finished on all exposed sides. Indirect reading lamps are placed near the sofa and chair and a small brass lamp is used on the desk. Over the desk is a handsome picture, and an end table and smoker complete the ensemble.

Walls in Pastel Rose

Upstairs on the right of the hall is a charming room furnished for a young girl. Walls are finished in a pastel rose and the popular blonde maple streamline furniture is used. The sleek lines are as modern as tomorrow and the large mushroom knobs are among the latest in design. A large chest of drawers, double bed and low vanity, bench and mirror are the major pieces. The boudoir chair is distinctive. It has modern lines and is covered in a Dubonnet rayon fabric having small eggshell stripes running through it, being finished with a heavy eggshell rope fringe which reaches to the floor. A room-size broadloom rug in pale Nile green forms the floor covering.

Next is the boy's room which has been done in rugged maple pieces. These are sturdily built and will withstand hardest wear. They have been fashioned by expert workmen to resemble old originals which have had the edges and corners worn by time and use. Pieces are Early American with a Dutch motif. Those used will serve two boys, twin beds, night table, large chest of drawers and large dresser and mirror. Reflecting the color scheme, against a pale green wallpaper, are the hooked rugs and boudoir chair with gay flowers against a black ground.

The Post Display Home and Kenwood may be reached by three routes. One is out Connecticut avenue to Chevy Chase Circle, and west on Grafton street, through Somerset. Another is out Wisconsin avenue northwest, to Dorset avenue, through Somerset. A third is out Connecticut or Wisconsin avenues to Bradley lane and west on Bradley lane to Kenwood.

Well Is Suitable To Condition Air

Wherever a good supply of well water is available summer air conditioning is possible. And it need not be a very deep well, either. Water at 55 degrees or even higher will give good cooling and a certain amount of dehumidification.

All that is necessary is a well with sufficient water at a low enough temperature, a pump, coils, a blower, a duct or two, and an available supply of electricity and you can be as cool as you like. The size and extent of the equipment will depend, of course, on the size of the house, the available water supply, the relative temperature, and—most important—the amount of insulation in the house.

The cost of insulation will vary with the extent of the work required in drilling the well. But under normal conditions it should not be prohibitive even for the average house of 6 or 8 rooms. The cost of operation, too, should be relatively small for a reasonable lowering of temperature and dehumidification. And the water need not be lost. It is under pressure and may be used for irrigation or may be sprinkled over the roof, thus adding much to the cooling process.

Storage Space Vital in Home

There should be ample storage space in a home in order to adequately provide for the proper keeping of articles not in immediate use.

Bedroom and coat closets used chiefly for hanging space should be not less than 1 foot 10 inches in depth. Linen closets should be about 16 to 18 inches in depth.

While it is impossible to fix a rule for the amount of closet space that will be universally applicable, it is advisable to have at least one closet for each bedroom, a closet for linen, and one in which to hang hats and coats. Outer garments are sometimes damp; consequently, the coat closet should be near the entrance door so that water and mud are not spread through the dwelling.

Asbestos Resists Fire

In finishing the attic of the home the owner may increase the fire resistance by installing some form of asbestos paper between the subflooring and finish flooring.

Hidden Radiators Boon to Designers

Recessed radiators have solved many of the architect's and decorator's problems. The entire wall is now available for furniture; where the radiator grilles are used, tables or low desks or chairs may be placed without interfering with the heating of the room or detriment to the furniture. Window sills may be as low as one likes, for it is not necessary to place the radiators under the windows to conserve wall space, and draperies are not soiled by the constant flow of dusty air.

The actual size of the radiator may be cut down because the draft, created by the wall stacks in which the radiators are set, carries the heat away from the radiators faster and spreads the warmed air more evenly about the room.

Pierre Urges Mobilization Of Building

Industry Should Be Ready to Serve U. S. In Peace, War, He Says

Mobilization of America's building industry "to serve the Nation in peace or war" is urged by Edward D. Pierre, of Indianapolis, president of the Indiana Chapter of the American Institute of Architects. Delay in developing a program of preparedness would be "suicidal", declares Mr. Pierre, who explains that "it is highly important that the industry realize this need before the Government does."

"The building industry is unprepared to meet any emergency that might arise," Mr. Pierre says, in part. "It has little knowledge of its weakness or strength, its manpower and its physical resources. The surrounding dangers of increasing magnitude should be warning enough to the profession and the industry to prepare for any emergency that may present itself.

"The building industry is the nation's greatest normal peacetime industry. It must realize its greatness and importance to the nation. By virtue of its vastness it has a tremendous influence on national well-being. It has a public obligation and responsibility. A new order of relationship is needed. Every man in the industry should strive for solidarity. The forces of design, management, craftsmen and materials should be welded into a united front.

"The American Institute of Architects should accept the challenge of leadership and instigate plans for aggressive action that will protect not only the interests of the industry but the nation as well. No one can contemplate the effects of war, especially one the extent of which is unknown, but some if its ill effects can be curbed by concerted, intelligent action. It would be suicidal to wait for these effects. The industry should concentrate on a program of preparedness that will serve the nation in peace or war.

"How the European war will effect the profession of architecture or the building industry is yet problematical. There will be reactions, some based on fact and some on imagination and opportunity. We have the history of similar circumstances. The same laws of greed and predatory motives that existed in the past exist today."

Seize Cool of Night

Insulation engineers advise the home owner to "trap the cool of the night" by insulating the rooms and keeping them open during the night. As soon after sun-up as possible the house should be closed, trapping the cool night air.

Lighting Fixtures Need Attention

Design, location and number of lighting fixtures to be made part of a home should be given careful attention. There is a trend entirely from attached lighting fixtures, and where this is followed an ample number of wiring outlets must be provided to care for movable lighting devices.

Proper light distribution and the elimination of glare should be sought in the selection and location of lighting fixtures.

Fixtures must be structurally sound and attractive in appearance. Extreme styles of lighting fixtures decline rapidly in value. Thus, simplicity in design should be sought.

Green Proves Charming As Bedroom Color

A California country home in the Santa Monica foothills has a master bedroom decorated charmingly in green. The walls and ceiling are painted ivy green and the rug, draperies and bedspread are of the same color.

The bedside table of bleached wood holds white pottery lamps with green floral sprays, and white ivy leaves cut from silk are appliqued onto the bed hangings.

Side Porches Make Good Sun Parlors

With comparatively little remodeling and expense, seldom-used side and rear porches may be converted into sun parlors.

A glass-in sun room is often the most popular room in a home and can be used for flowers and often for a summer sleeping porch.

Fall Flower Shows Keep Gardener Busy

Offer Good Excuse for Not Staying at Home and Tending To Needs of His Own Plot

By Katherine Barrett Pozer.

There is such a diversity of interests for gardeners in these autumn days that it is difficult to budget one's time to include all of them. It is a great temptation to let everything else go and just enjoy the out-of-doors, as highways beckon and the gay autumn colors each day deepen along the roadways. The flower shows have been and are still very intriguing. They offer a splendid alibi for neglecting one's duties, and forgetting that fall work pays great dividends. Later when leaf raking time begins in earnest it is not so difficult to stay at home, for, then there are few gardeners who can escape the lure of getting out in the garden. Many who haven't made their appearance since the early spring gardening urge swept the country will be seen extremely busy trying to cover the neglected spots and making all sorts of good resolutions for next year.

It is then that "bulb fever" begins in earnest and hasty trips are made for the last minute purchases. But there are always these last minute purchases, for even the most careful gardener who has ordered his bulbs months ago cannot resist the fall advertisements once they have started bulb planting.

This year the temptations are particularly great. With war hanging over Europe anxious gardeners are worrying about their orders which were placed earlier in the year, and questioning the possibilities of next year's supplies being limited. If in this frame of mind it will be well to check over lists and yield to the temptation of a few more purchases. One thing is certain, when the first days of spring come and crocus, narcissus and other bulbs put up their green spikes and their blossems we will not regret that we succumbed to the urge of adding to our bulb supplies. Some of these last minute purchases might include some of the narcissus which have recently been commented on by the Test Chairman of the Garden Club of Virginia and in Horticulture. An announcement has been made of the special classes which will be open to all amateurs at the Alexandria Show and adding to the narcissus list might raise one's chances of winning one of the much sought trophies.

Varieties Suggested

Comment on the Alexandria show and on some of the outstanding novelties was made in the September 1 copy of Horticulture in the "Rambling Observations of a Roving Gardener." It says: "Now that the time for planting daffodils is again at hand, I feel justified in writing something about the varities I saw and the impressions I formed when visiting shows and gardens last spring. Perhaps I had my most interesting experience at the great Virginia show held in Alexandria this year and which now has come to be visited by daffodil lovers from many distant countries.

"Among the many flowers noted at the show were such trumpets as Lord of the Manor, Sleive Donard, Solid Gold, Sorley Boy and Staatendam. The white trumpet Corinth received special mention as one of the finest flowers at the show. (Ed. Note—This was the winner of the special award, and grown by Mrs. Louis Scott of the Garden Club of Alexandria.) Coverback Gem, Copper Bowl, Invergordon and Red Shadow were particularly noted in various parts of the show, and in Mr. Morrison's group, Porthilly and St. Erwin stood out. Mr. Morrison also showed the new variety Market Mary in the yellow barrii class and an unusual strain of jonquilla which was charming. Noteworthy were Dinton Red, Ian Secret and Red Rim. It was interesting to learn that most of Mr. Morrison's flowers were not grown in cultivated beds but naturalized in woodland.

"A visit to Mr. Morrison's garden later revealed many thousands of seedlings being grown and tested.—I was interested on the same trip also in seeing the seedling collection of Mr. E. C. Powell, also near Washington, part of which he showed at the Takoma Park Horticultural Society Show."

In notes from the Narcissus Test Garden in the September Garden Gossip, official organ of the Garden Club of Virginia, Miss Martha Harris, test chairman for the Virginia Clubs, comments on some of the outstanding and much advertised varieties. Of some of them she says: "After the mild winter and the cool spring the flowers bloomed beautifully—color and form and husky growth were all there. Even the varieties of pink and apricot held their color—Cherie, Still Waters, Tullia and Saskia, to name a few, and all behaving as they should behave . . . Stamboul poened gloriously. But the wonderfully red edge of the cup burnt with the sun. Kennack burnt too, but Market Mary stayed in good condition. Market Mary's short stem is its only flaw. Of the whites and reds Lady Kesteven was far and away the most brillint—besides the startling contrast in colors this variety has good substance.

"As one looks back, a few stand out—the immense and dark Trenoon, the brilliant Feu de Jioe, the enameled jewels that are Lacquer, Grey Lady, Misty Moon and Polar Sea, the little round red and white Red Beason, the fascinating sprawling, Prince Fushimi, the odd and white Tregantle, the wonderfully pure Samaria and Cushendall, Cherie, the pale apricot jonquil and the most ethereal of them all St. Erme."

New Collection

The narcissus test committee is sending out a new collection which consists of the following varieties: Golden Perfection, Sunstar, Ringdove, Beryl, Chastity, Circlet, Still Waters and Butter Bowl.

Miss Harris announces that the show will be held again in Alexandria next April will have three special classes for individual members and member clubs of the Garden Club of Virginia and three special classes which will be open to all amateurs. The classes which will be open to all amateurs are:

1—Collection of ten varieties of Incomparabilis with yellow perianth, one stalk each, to be shown without foliage.

2—Collection of not less than six varieties of white trumpets, one stalk each to be shown with any kind of foliage in glass vase not less than nine inches high. List of varieties must accompany exhibit.

3—Collection of not less than three varieties of miniature narcissus two stalks each, to be shown without foliage in container furnished by show committee. This class is intended for miniature species and hybrids with all forms of Tazetta excluded. No narcissus attaining a height of more than twelve inches or flower of more than one and one half inches in diameter when flattened out may be shown in this class.

Fairfax Club Show

Many lovers of the outdoors as well as garden enthusiasts will drive up to Centreville, for the flower show of the Garden Club of Fairfax which is being held next Saturday afternoon. The Fairfax Club is holding the show in the old stone mill; owned by Mrs. Dorothy Radford.

A number of well known Virginia and Washington clubs are planning to exhibit in the inter-club class which is open to all garden clubs. This class is particularly fitting for Fairfax which lies in the hunting country as it will be a setting for a hunt breakfast. Another class which has aroused interest and many inquiries as to just what it means is a "tussy-mussy" which is one of the small, tight bouquets so loved by the belles of crinoline days.

The hours of the show will be from 2 p. m. to 5 p. m. The public is invited. Tea will be served in Mrs. Radford's home which adjoins the mill. Judges and exhibitors will be entertained at luncheon by the club. Entries must be placed by noon and stay in place until the closing hour. Only one entry is allowed an exhibitor in any class.

Today the Potomac Rose show goes into its second and last day, and the show promises to present even a lovelier picture than that of yesterday due to the new methods of judging, which helped to insure that only fresh flowers would be entered and not those who had been held over too long in ice boxes. Judging took place several hours after all flowers were entered and blooms were judged on their appearance after standing in the hall during this period of time. The show will remain open until 10 tonight. The opening hour today is 1:30. The show is being held at Tenth and Constitution avenue in the New National Museum.

Two Dahlia Displays

Interest in dahlias which has been so greatly aroused by the recent National Capitol Dahlia Show will continue through this week when the public will have the opportunity of visiting two dahlia shows nearby—that of the Woodridge Garden Club on Wednesday and that of the Takoma Horticultural Society on Thursday and Friday. Some of the best known local dahlia growers belong to these two clubs and there will be many splendid entries in the competitive classes.

Fall fruits, flowers and vegetables will be included with the dahlias at the Woodridge show. There will be thirty-eight classes for dahlia specimens and for arrangements which include dahlias. Dahlia collections will be in three classes, one for collection of fifteen, one for ten and one for five. In these classes the flowers must be named and each placed in a separate container. The single specimen classes will include every type of dahlia and where there are three or more entries of the same color, it will be declared a separate class. Featured will be the seedlings class and the House Beautiful Dahlia Futurity Class for which a medal will be awarded. The Futurity has a section for foreign varieties in which there is so much interest.

Takoma Show

With only one more show to be held this season, interest in the Takoma Horticultural shows is very keen. The annual award for the most points gained in all the shows is the Henry Dreer cup. All classes in the show will be for dahlias with the exception of six rose classes. The collections will be for 25 dahlias 12 and six. Single specimens will be in the 18 classes for different types of dahlias and sub color classes. In the arrangements there will be three classes for baskets of large flowered dahlias; one variety, more than one variety and one or more varieties with or without other flowers. Vases of large flowered varieties, one variety, more than one variety and dahlias with or without other flowers. Baskets of pom-poms with or without other flowers and vases of pompoms with or without other flowers or foliage. A floating arrangement of dahlias. Roses in baskets and vases and a miniature class not over seven inches with dahlia the predominant flower. The House Beautiful Futurity will be held with the Bronze Horticultural Medal as award.

The show will be held at the Takoma Firehouse, Carrol and Denwood avenues. It will be open to the public without charge from 7 to 10 p. m. on Thursday and on Friday from 9 a. m. to 9 p. m. All amateurs are invited to compete. Entries must be in place by 3 p. m. on Thursday.

Plants Accent Design of Garden

Water Lily's Beauty Revealed in Pattern Of Tomorrow's Garden

Nine member clubs of the Garden Club of America from Connecticut and New York are responsible for the "Garden of Tomorrow" in the horticultural center at the New York World's Fair. As its title implies, the design of the garden is modern. It is the work of Carol Fulkerson who makes no claim that this exhibit is adaptable to the average home grounds. She regards it as an exhibition garden, imbued with the gay atmosphere of a world's fair.

The garden covers an odd-shaped corner space with the two inner sides defined by a four to five foot fence-like inclosure of corrugated glass held upright between pipes driven into the ground. A fountain and pool with broad flagstone coping occupies the inside corner of the garden, with a narrow strip between it and the glass fence planted to pink geraniums and exquisite large flowering pink cannas. The latter also are ranged along the fence to the right of the pool, while the geraniums occupy the space to the left spreading into a broad bed beneath the overhanging branches of a gnarled old scrub pine which stands near the left outside corner of the space.

Gravel Walk Effective

A glistening white gravel walk around two sides of the pool curves into the center of the garden, becoming narrower and more spiral-like as it climbs in a gradual slope to a pinnacle where it is lost in a luscious planting of curly leafed Japanese cabbage. This same strange, but interesting material is used to border one side of the patn as it curves from the pool. The other side of path and garden is planted with broad masses of white and purple petunias. This walk, not connected with any entrance to the garden, is edged on one side with brown slate, on the other with half-round cedar posts, which range in height from a scant inch exposed above the surface of the ground to 12 to 15 inches, thereby giving the walk its gradual elevation.

A small grass plot on the side of the garden opposite the massed petunias complete the composition except for six or eight dwarf shrubs spaced around the outsides to form a partial inclosure. An apple tree and masses of winged euonymus, accented with groups of tall red cedars in the gardens which are just behind the glass fence, add desirable background and framing qualities to the picture.

Color Blends Impressive

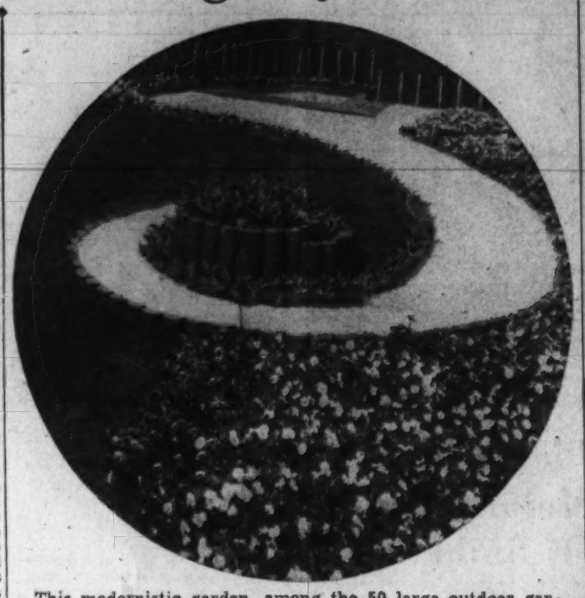
The design done in the manner of a Picasso abstraction is supposed to bring all elements into a feeling of gay motion. Many viewing the garden are impressed by the delightful combination of pink, white and lavender together with the light gray green of the cabbage leaves shaded and streaked a deep purple and magenta.

In three long pools or canals covering a total expanse of between 180 and 200 feet in length, the New York Botanical Gardens has staged a water garden which is now in full flower. Hardy water lilies and both day and night blooming varieties are luxurfant in growth and colors which range from white through yellow, fresh tints, pink, red, lavender, purple and light and dark blues.

Famed in Oleanders

The pools, set in a neutral foil of dark green English ivy which borders them, are accented at the corners with specimen oleanders in ample green tubs. These give the garden height in foliage and flower, effectively frame the long vista down the length of the pools and cast comfortagle shadows across water and surrounding walks.

The aim of this exhibit is to demonstrate the value of water lilies and other plans in furnishing flowers all summer long in both private and public gardens. The plants used in the pools were selected from 80 varieties which have been under trial at the botanical gardens in Bronx Park. That a choice selection was made is being demonstrated daily.



This modernistic garden, among the 50 large outdoor gardens at the horticultural exhibition at the New York World's Fair, is sponsored by nine garden clubs of the States of Connecticut and New York, members of the Garden Club of America

Lilies Easy To Grow From Fall Planting

The notion that lilies are hard to grow has small basis in fact. Quite the reverse is true in the case of most varieties. There are many which can be set out this fall with almost complete assurance of beautiful blooms next year.

Lilium Rubrum, one of the best garden varieties

Plant in a well-drained location which is shaded from the hottest sun. Shrub or hardy plant borders are excellent situations, and furnish good backgrounds for the lilies' beauty.

Most of the lilies need deep planting. Six inches is about right for most of them, but the Madonnas need only 2 or 3 inches of soil above them.

A balanced plant food is fine, and some varieties will need additional spring applications. Use 1 pint to a bushel of soil. Spade your bed deeply before setting out the bulbs. If you think the ground will be frozen before the bulbs arrive, give the bed a mulch of leaves or straw to keep it from freezing until you can get the bulbs in.

Many lilies blossom in midsummer when there is a natural letdown in garden color, and the lilies are more than welcome. We find ourselves admiring and depending upon them well into September. Regal lily, a queen of lilies, should be in every garden, where its gorgeous pink striped flowers with golden throats are unsurpassed for beauty.

Here is a list of ten easily grown lilies: L. candidum, the Madonna lily, formerly grown by florists as the Easter lily; L. regale, the royal lily, white with pink markings; L. speciosum, a Japanese variety of which two varieties are common, rubrum, white marked with rose, and album, all white; L. henryii, known as the yellow speciosum; L. tigrinum, var. splendens, the tiger lily; L. tenuifolium, the coral lily of Siberia; L. auratum, the Japanese gold-banded lily; L. elegans, showy Japanese lily, including red and yellow; L. testaceum, fragrant buff-colored flowers growing 3 feet high; L. martagon, purple flowers spotted with black.

Tulips Ideal to Paint Spring Garden Picture

A box of colors will paint no picture more beautiful than a box of tulips. Nor will any artist find a palette of colors more brilliant or diverse to work with. In a fashion they are nature's gift to the gardener whose sense of artistry may be expressed and recreated each spring as he paints his garden picture with them.

Simple to look at and to work with, they furnish unending arrangements of brilliant color beginning in the earliest spring months and continuing through May, which is tulip time in most States.

Few flowers are so satisfying to work with as the tulip. Its growth is dependable, and one can almost bet on the height it will attain. The colors have none of the capriciousness of seedlings, and can be relied upon according to the catalog description. If planted at the same depth and in soil of the same nature, they will all bloom together, almost on the same day.

Their gay colors which contrast so strikingly with the bleakness of winter, come in a range which is almost complete. Clear white, with but a tiny speck of pink, is the beginning. Then comes the roses, yellows, reds, orange, bronze, lavenders and violets, some of the latter being so deep they are almost black. Only blue is lacking.

The Darwin, breeder and cottage types may be all planted at the same time in the fall. Although they are distinctly different strains, they have characteristics much alike, and are all May-flowering types.

The basis of classification is blood relationship and family resemblance. There is no reason why varieties of all these different classes should not be grown in the same bed, provided colors are chosen which look well together; and it is hard to find a color clash among the May flowering tulips.

All of these garden classes are hybrids; that is, they have been developed from native species. Most of the native species are May flowering. Many are still grown in rock gardens and for naturalized effects. As a rule they are smaller and less hardy and, of course, of a much less interesting color range than the hybrids which represent several centuries of plant breeding for improvement.

Being one of the oldest of garden flowers with a recorded history, the tulips have an interesting background. The oldest of the garden types are the breeders. No one knows from what native species they came. But they were grown by the Dutch breeders of the sixteenth century for the purpose of producing, by the process known as "breaking," the gayly striped varieties now called bybloemans and bizarres. These striped varieties were highly valued and speculating in them caused the financial crisis known as the tulipomania.

The breeder tulips were never so highly valued for their own merits as they now are, when modern taste considers their rich but somewhat dull colors, in which tones of brown are usually present, most desirable in the garden.

Darwin tulips were an introduction late in the last century, supposed to be hybrids of breeder tulips, but the origin was kept secret by the introducers. They are characterized by soft pastel colors, always with white overbloom, including a remarkably complete color range, but lacking entirely so far, good yellows.

Cottage tulips are brighter in color, not so tall, and not so large as the Darwins and breeders. They are usually later and they have brilliant yellows. The flowers as a rule have pointed petals, which often are inclined to reflex or turn back.

Save Leaves

Don't burn your leaves! Pile them up to decay. There is no substitute for humus, or decayed vegetable matter, for the lawn or garden.

Fall Planting Tasks Are Of Two Classes

Fall planting is of two kinds: First, the tasks which can be done only in the fall, and second, those which can be performed either in the fall or spring.

There is no option about the first class, which includes the planting of tulip, narcissus, hyacinth and the minor hardy bulbs, and setting out of peonies and madonna lilies. If these subjects have not been put in the ground by the time it freezes you must wait another year to add them to your garden picture.

It is surprising the number who do not understand this and who try to purchase tulip bulbs in the spring. These fall bulbs are imported each year at this time from Holland and are available at no other time. They must pass the winter in your garden soil in order to bloom in the spring.

The second class of fall planting tasks, those which can be done either in fall or spring, include many which are better done in the fall, and the experienced gardener may usually be told by the way in which he gets these jobs out of the way.

Fall planting is essentially a matter of foresight. There is no urge like the spring garden fever; only a keen imagination will bridge over the months of snow and winter just ahead to see the burst of spring glory next year toward which our fall work will contribute. Only one-third of all gardeners undertake complete fall planting programs.

The optional job include planting trees and perennials, making and repairing lawns, and sowing some annual and perennial flower seeds.

Use a Dibber

A dibber is a good tool for bulb planting. Learn the knack of giving it a swinging twist to make the bottom of the hole round so the bulbs will not be "hung" with air space under them. You will get it with a litle practice.

A Deep Bed for Lilies

Dig two spades' depths down in preparing a bed for lilies which must be planted deep, particularly the stem rooting types.

Minor Bulbs Bloom When Snows Melt

Spring months are almost pure joy for the garden lover, free from the grief and disappointments which come later, with the weeds, the insects, perhaps a drought, or other difficulties.

In the spring our efforts show a higher average of success, and we bring to our enjoyment of their achievements an eager appreciation. Each tiny flower and green leaf, when it first appears, gives a thrill to its beholder, whose eyes have been wearied by the winter drabness.

Yet the average garden in April and May has little to offer, compared with what it might present, because the spring flowering bulbs, upon which gardens chiefly depend for early flowers, are planted by only one-third of all garden owners.

The flowers which will give you thrills in April are not numerous and you do not need so many of them. They are called minor bulbs, probably because they are small and produce small plants with relatively tiny blossoms. In June they would probably not be noticed, but in April they have no competition and are precious beyond price. Small they may be, but they have a most amazing hardiness.

Snowdrops, so perfectly named, because they often blossom in the snow and look like drops of snow would look if there were such things, pass a winter of subzero temperatures buried 3 inches deep, often incased in ice; and then at the first real thaw of the spring, they burst into leaf and bloom. Frosts and freezing do not hurt them even then.

Scillas, which bloom after the snowdrops, are quite as hardy, and more vigorous. Their flowers of vivid blue are held up above their leaves and carpet the ground with color in a way which violets never do. Scillas drop seed and spread rapidly or treble its area in a few years.

Crocuses

Crocuses, which bloom after the scillas, have larger bulbs and larger flowers; they are not so easy to keep, but with their brilliant yellow and lavender flowers they bring the first vivid color contrast into the garden picture. They will last for years without lifting the bulbs if you plant them in a well-drained place and see that their leaves are not disturbed until they turn yellow, which is a sign that the bulbs are cured. Often rabbits eat their leaves; or if planted in the grass the lawn mower cuts them off and so destroys the bulbs. The place for them is in a cultivated bed or border.

These three flowers are the principal subjects on which we depend for April blossoms. It is remarkable how much pleasure a few bulbs of each will bring in the early spring. No one attempts to plant the entire garden for this period; groups of from a dozen to a hundred bulbs are sufficient in the small garden.

The location of this early show is important. If the flowers can be seen from a window, and so enjoyed even on inclement days, the pleasure they give is increased.

If one wishes to enlarge the number of spring flowers there are several others which can be planted. The chiondoxas (glory of the snow) have clear blue star flowers with white centers, and blossom with the scillas. The fritillarias, grape hyacinths and spring snowflakes (leucojum vernum) come later than the crocuses. And for companions to the early bulbs dwarf irises, of the cristata and pumila classes, may be planted.

Spade Tulips Early

Spade tulip beds early and have the soil ready when the bulbs arrive. Bad weather may set in, which will make digging difficult, and you will have to use speed to get the bulbs in.

Gardener's Calendar

Pot up house plants that have been summering in the garden. Until the Weather Bureau warns of frost they are better off outdoors—with pots sunk into the garden soil for ease in watering.

Plant grass on thin spots in lawn after applying a topdressing of sand, peat moss and complete fertilizer.

Prune dead wood and broken branches from trees and shrubs, covering wounds with a protecting coating.

Plant Virginia bluebells in moist and somewhat shaded spots in the garden.

Plant bulbs with the exception of tulips—and tulips, too, if it is more convenient.

Overhaul perennial border and rock gardens, dividing plants and renewing organic material. Leaf mold, leaf soil, or thoroughly rotted manure make good organic fertilizers. Peat moss adds humus but not much fertility.

Plant evergreens with a ball of soil and prepare planting holes for the deciduous trees and shrubs that are plantable as soon as they are dormant.

Larkspur seed planted now should germinate in cool fall days, should winter well, and should provide stronger plants than from early spring sowings.

Plant peonies in well settled soil—covering just 2 inches.

Plan Tulip Plantings, Complete Bulb Order

A colorful planting of May-flowering tulips

Actual Planting Should Be Postponed Until Late October or Early November

By Crowell Baynes.

It is time to plan tulip plantings and to complete the bulb order, even though the actual planting of the tulips had best be delayed until late October or early November. If the plan is to plant tulips to follow gladiolus, canas, or dahlias there will be no harm in postponing tulip planting until frost cuts the display of fall flowers.

In a late and mild fall there is some danger that the tulips may make too much growth after an early planting. They make good root growth even in cool weather and get established for the spring sprint, even if planted when frosty nights are the rule. The species tulips, such as are more commonly planted in rock gardens are less likely to make fall growth and may as well be placed whenever convenient in the fall overhaul of the rock garden.

The tulips are justly among the prime favorites of good gardeners, but not many gardeners realize the full values that tulips offer. Tulips are commonly regarded as one of the "fool-proof" garden subjects, but with rather a limited range in formal beds and arrangements. Many gardeners expect to buy new stock each year and disregard the old bulbs that are discarded when the beds are refilled with summer bloomers. Planting stock is not particularly expensive, but discarding good bulbs after a single season of bloom is wasteful.

Tulips really are highly adaptable, and good planting stock multiplies more rapidly and more reliably than most other garden material. Understanding of the life history of a tulip bulb helps to guide in using tulips effectively.

Fool-proof First Year

Commercial bulbs are full grown to the size which dealers recognize as sure to give maximum bloom the first year. Nearly all the food required for splendid bloom is stored in the bulb, and the root system that develops during the winter is mainly to bring water to the bulb in spring. This is why the tulip is fool-proof the first year.

Strong green leaves and the flowering stem develop from the bulb and after it blooms, there is development of a bulblet that grows at the side and within the covering of the main bulb. Several other bulblets may develop from the base of the main bulb. The bulblet that replaces the main bulb may or may not grow to flowering size in the weeks after the big bulb blooms. Usually it takes two or three years for this to develop to first quality size, and the small bulbs from the base rarely bloom the next season. This is the explanation of the inferior size of flowers the second year if bulbs are left in the ground over summer.

But if the tulips are left for two, three or four years, there will be enough irregularity in multiplication so that a bed will have two or three sizes of bloom and many small bulbs that develop only leaves. The same effect results if all the bulbs and bulblets are dug after planting and are then replanted in fall. When bulbs are dug in summer after the first year of a tulip planting, it is good gardening to plant them all in the vegetable garden the second fall, and return only the large size bulbs to the flowering bed the third fall.

Conserve Strength

By growing the smaller bulbs in the vegetable garden, it is practical to cut the small size flowers for home decoration. In bouquets these are quite as choice as large blossoms. By cutting them as soon as the buds begin to open, the bulb saves food and makes faster growth toward the full flowering size.

But it is not essential to dig tulips every year, particularly when they are used in borders of perennials or in beds where they are to be followed by annual flowers. There is some danger of loss from moles and mice, and the Washington climate is rather moister than is desirable for summering tulips in the ground. There may be trouble from mildews and decays, but this is a possibility not a probability. One planting of tulips naturalized with camassias in rather heavy clay has lived undisturbed for seven years and has just about held its own, with about as many good blossoms each year as in the original planting and perhaps twice as many smaller blossoms.

In perennial beds, tulips can be left from year to year with fair assurance that there will be attractive bloom until the beds get a general overhauling. In a fall overhauling it is only necessary to keep an eye to bulbs that are uncovered in spading and to replant them.

Combine With Annuals

One of the possibilities of tulip culture that is rarely realized is the combination of tulips in spring with summer annuals later in the season, and followed by the same combination for at least two seasons more. This is thoroughly practical if the gardener follows the suggestion frequently repeated in these columns of digging two spade depths deep with a heavy composting of the lower layer.

In a bed dug deep fairly early in the fall, plant the tulips in late fall after the soil has settled. The tulips bloom in spring and the bed can then be filled with summer annuals. The tulips will have ripened by late June or early July before the annuals cut off all the sun from the tulip leaves. The growing annuals will keep the bed fairly well dried out in summer, and in fall the annuals can be cut off or pulled with only slight disturbance of the tulips which will divide and bloom sparingly the next spring. The bed may be filled with forget-me-nots, pansies, primulas, and English daisies to make an attractive display with the small tulips, and these spring plants can be cleared out to make space for a second summer season of transplanted annuals above the ripening tulips.

Prevent Waste

By the third spring, the tulips will be making a brave show again and there will be less need for the small plants in spring, though they are desirable. After a third summer of annuals it will probably be wise to dig deep again and renew fertility with fresh compost. The point of difference from the usual garden procedure is that by digging deep it is entirely practical to leave the tulips alone for three years. In a bed made friable by deep digging, annuals will do well for the three seasons without need for a spading that will disturb the tulips. A thorough raking or stirring of the soil with a hand cultivator will leave the soil in good condition for transplanting the annuals.

With gardens dug only a single spade length deep in fall, it may be necessary to spade again to prepare for annuals, and that is the system that leads to the discarding of good tulip stock before it has time to multiply and grow back to fine blooming quality.

Planting stock can be saved by digging bulbs as soon as they have bloomed and transplanting them to ripen in the vegetable garden, but this calls for considerable extra work and the disturbance of the roots does not favor rapid regrowth.

Probably the most popular single use for tulips is to alternate with gladiolus, dahlias, and cannas. This is thoroughly practical rotation and the tulips can be allowed to ripen before it is necessary to set out dahlias or the later plantings of glads.

Put Snowdrops in Sun

A south wall is the best place to plant your snowdrops. Put them near a window, and you will wake up some sunshiny February morning and find them in bloom.

Flowers in Cracks

Scatter portulaca seed in the cracks in crazy paving. It will come up next spring and give a gay picture in mid-summer. It will not germinate until the weather is warm.

Mix Narcissus

Narcissi like to grow among the roots of other plants. For this reason they flourish excellently tucked in among perennials in the garden, or at the base of the shrubbery border.

Signs Call For Material Of Quality

Selection of Colors For Visibility Is of Prime Importance

By Lynn Wood.

Signs of the times are always important—especially where advertising is concerned. A neat, well-painted sign is indicative of a well-ordered business, just as originality in the design and its execution reveals an up-to-the-minute grasp of affairs by the firm or individual represented.

In sign painting, it is important to use only highest quality materials and colors that are both light-fast and weather-resistant. Remember they will be exposed to the constant alternation of blazing sun and beating storm. And color selection from the point of visibility is an element of prime significance.

A recent survey has shown that, out of 13 combinations tested, black letters on yellow is the combination which can be read father away than any other. After that comes green on white, red on white, blue on white, white on blue, black on white, yellow on red and, last of all, red on green. Visibility, however, should not be the only consideration. The color of the building against which the sign is displayed must be regarded to avoid a discordant effect.

Don't Put Up Too Many

Too many advertising signs, prominently displayed, have a distinctly home-made look. The well-grounded commercial sign-painter should perfect himself in lay-out work, color harmony and design. In addition, he should possess an extensive knowledge of all types of lettering and should know how to adapt each particular type of lettering to its particular purpose.

Accordingly, signs should not only be neatly made and painted, but the letters should be well-spaced and well-proportioned to the size of the sign. Furthermore, a touch of originality will serve to capture the eye of the passer-by, where a more mediocre production will pass as just one more sign.

Directions to a coffee shop, that are well presented and tasteful both in wording and color, for example, will have a much happier effect upon the appetite of the tourist than one carlessly constructed with indifferent materials.

The nature of the sign of course depends on the type of advertising you want to do. If it is for an inn, a residence or a roadside stand, individual differences must be considered, and styles in signs may bear out the architectural background, covering a wide range through Oriental, colonial, modernistic, rustic and so on.

Pine and Hemlock Good

While most signs are made of wood, metals and synthetic materials are also employed. Although some signs are cut with raised letters and some with sunken ones, paint is applied to either variety and finished with a protective of lacquer.

For small wooden signs, white pine or hemlock is satisfactory, being light in weight and taking paint and oil well. You can also use basswood, cottonwood, maple and redwood. Dealers in sign wood and supplies carry the wood or you may procure it from manufacturers of display boards. Though many signs are of so inexpensive quality as to be mercly cheap, plain wood without a border and consequently subject to cracking and warping, others are properly framed and generally well made.

Perhaps the signs are to be painted on glass. In this case, ready-bound, coach painter's colors, thinned with turpentine, should be used. This dries in a few hours to a flat finish which—under normal circumstances — is reasonably durable. Additional wear may be obtained by giving the letters a second coat to which about one-fourth (by volume) of elastic carriage varnish has been added. Before applying the letters to the glass, first clean the glass with turpentine and methylated spirit. Two guide lines should be snapped onto the outside of the glass and the letters outlined with a piece of soap sharpened to an edge.

Occasionally a painter is required to paint a sign on a galvanized iron roof. This requires a rather different mode of treatment. If the iron roof is new, it should first be treated with a solution made by dissolving eight ounces of copper acetate to a gallon of water. This is applied to the surfaee of the roof with a wide brush and allowed to dry, then rinsed off with water. One of the high-grade metal primers is applied next. When this has dried, follow it with the finishing coat of good exterior oil paint. Some dealers carry a special type of primer which is said to be sufficiently adherent without previous chemical treatment of the roof's surface.

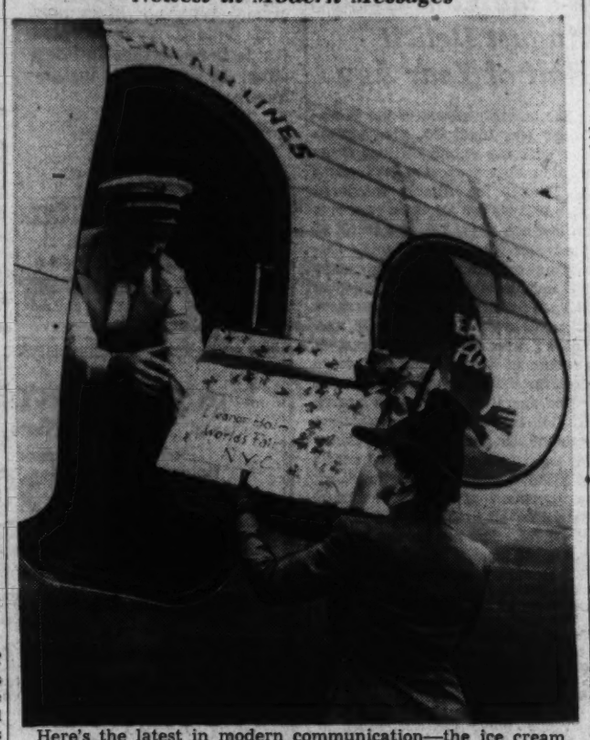
Newest in Modern Messages



Here's the latest in modern communication—the ice cream "Eat-o-gram." Miss Annette Given, of Southern Dairies, is shown handing one to Frank St. Mary, Eastern Air Line flight steward, for delivery to Elinor Holm at the New York World's Fair. The eat-o-gram is a slab of ice cream similar to a standard telegram blank. The message is inscribed on the ice cream and the eat-o-gram is rushed to its destination. After reading the message the recipient eats it

Space Imperative For Sport Needs

With growing interest in sports, all the members of the family need some place to keep their golf clubs, tennis raquets, badminton bats, hockey sticks, skates etc. The house that has a large closet or small room that can be used for the accommodation of such articles is lucky. But even if there is space available, racks and hooks and pegs should be provided to hold them or there will be just a jumble that will be hard on implements and tempers.

A series of stout wooden hooks, like old-fashioned hat racks, sloping down toward the wall make a good place to hold the golf clubs. Shoe shelves with grooves can be arranged for skates. Wooden pegs set in the wall hold tennis rackets without straining the frames or damaging the gut.

It is fun to plan just how the space available can be best used to take care of all the sport needs of the family. After the closet is arranged it will be a great saving to the pocketbook, because such things deteriorate rapidly unless properly cared for.

Soda Solution Good For Removing Paint

When a film of paint, varnish, shellac or glue is to be removed from brick masonry, a pound and a half of caustic soda in a gallon of water should be freely applied to the surface. When the paint or varnish has been removed, flush off the surface with a hose, if possible, to remove all traces of the caustic soda.

If the film of paint is very thick it may be more satisfactorily removed by sandblasting. On the other hand, if it is very light, wire or steel brushes and scrapers may suffice.

Loose Joints Often Sources of Leaks

There are many places in roofs and walls of a home where joints must be watertight. Joints where one roof surface intersects another to form a valley, at gutters, and where parts of the building project above or through the roof—Chimneys, dormers, vents, etc.—are sources of possible trouble from leaks.

Valleys and gutters are not to be catch-basins or reservois but channels to lead water away. Wall flashings should be designed and placed to turn all water and moisture to the outside face, where additional means of drainage should be supplied.

Dash of Blue Adds Spice to Kitchen

A kitchen made new with color combines green with yellow to good effect, and adds, for spice, a dash of blue. Apple green paint covers the baseboard, cabinet and wood-trim. The walls are painted deep cream.

Dark green linoleum covers the floor and sprigged chintz curtains with a yellow ground inclose glass curtains of a soft but striking shade of blue.

Laundry Tray, Sink Combined

In a house that has no laundry room, a combination sink and laundry tray in the kitchen will prove a great convenience.

If the kitchen is large enough to store a washing machine as well, all the household laundry work can be done right there. If there is no room for the machine, all but the large pieces, like sheets and tablecloths, can be washed in the combination fixture. Such fixtures take up no more room than the usual sink and drainboard, as they come as small as 38 by 20 inches.

Linoleum for Floor And Walls Harmonizes

An interesting combination for modern kitchens can be found in matched wall and floor linoleums. Wall linoleum, as a treatment for side walls, reflects the qualities that have made it popular for floors.

Another use of wall linoleum, said by builders to be growing in popularity, is in shower stalls.

The Week In Business

Edmund O. Carl, vice president and general manager of Call Carl, Inc., announces appointment of D. E. Thomas to head the Call Carl Motor Sales Co. owned and operated by that corporation, and metropolitan dealers for Hudson automobiles. Mr. Thomas, until recently, was assistant zone manager of Washington territory for Hudson Motor Car Co., serving in this capacity for about three years. A few months ago he was appointed eastern regional manager for Hudson Motor Car Co., covering New York State and the New England area, from which position he comes to his present office. His automobile experience dates back about 20 years during which time he not only had factory experience but conducted retail sales operations as well.

Maj. Henry A. Cunningham, recently appointed manager of the Alexandria branch of Ford Motor Co., was host yesterday at a meeting and luncheon to Ford, Mercury and Lincoln Zephyr dealers of the zone, held at the Mayflower Hotel. There were about 500 present and in addition to a showing of 1940 models of automobiles to be built by Ford Motor Co. for the coming year, sales and advertising plans were discussed.

Hotel Exhibits Ingenuity in Its Remodeling

Woman Cuts Down the Furniture's Legs and Removes Gewgaws

By Jean Mowat.

Chicago, Ill.—Stretching the budget for new furniture is a familiar problem in every household but we seldom think of it in regard to large hotels. Yet the same problem recently confronted the executive housekeeper of a 1,000 room hotel here and served as no small challenge to her ingenuity. It was necessary for her to do the remodeling of the hotel on little more than the work of the regular carpenters and painters of the hotel staff.

She began her modernization program by visiting many other hotels and by studying the decorative styles in retail stores. The result was that she decided the best way to create a modern effect in interiors was to have simplicity of line, beauty of coloring, short legs on chairs and tables, light finishes on furniture and rough-textured fabrics everywhere. In short, a combination of American and Swedish Modern.

The furniture of the hotel was of the vintage of 20 years ago. First of all she ordered the legs cut down so that the furniture hugged the floor. All ornamental wooden gewgaws were removed. Dressers were made into chests of drawers with matching wooden knobs and mirrors were re-framed with unpretentious molding or were applied with large decorative tacks directly to the wall. All furniture was refinished in light modern tones.

The 200 rooms in the first group re-decorated were small and had never had space for a desk. In the re-finishing process, an extension board was attached to the chest and a chair redesigned to slip under it. As beds were also a problem, a studio couch was installed with a headboard that served as a bookcase—also as a night table and lamp stand.

Where it was possible a washable fabric was used as cover material for the chairs. The draperies and couch covers matched and the sleeping pillows were zipped into solid-colored covers for day-time couch decoration. There was no money for new carpets so the old ones were turned and the worn sections put under the couch. Gay rugs repeated the dominate color in each room.

To complete the idea of the modern, long, low rooms, the side walls were painted in an ivory, cream or soft yellow tint and the ends of the room—the window and couch walls—were painted a dark ocean blue or a dark oak brown. The same color that was used for the end walls was also employed for the ceiling and was used as a 3-inch color band on the doors leading to the bathroom, the closet and the outer door. The doors were done in the same light tones as the furniture.

Quaint old-fashioned flower prints were bought in a second-hand book store and the carpenters framed them. The demand of guests for these flower prints, incidentally, has grown to such proportions that a framed supply is kept on hand for sale. The unfinished furniture has proved so interesting that manufacturers of fine furniture inquired whose product it was.

The last block of the 1,000 rooms is now being completed. Each time a group of rooms is done, the lessons learned on the previous group are applied. Consequently, there is much variety, but the same general idea of modernism, color and simplicity prevails throughout the hotel.

Ready-Mixed Paints Started About 1860

The practice of preparing ready-mixed paint for dealers to distribute to their customers did not come into existence until about 1860. To make this a popular commodity, it was necessary to overcome considerable prejudice on the part of the painters who had been accustomed to mixing pigment and vehicle with muller and slab. By 1935, however, the value of the products of the paint manufacturing industry reached nearly $416,000,000.

Paint to Avoid Soiling

A colonial house in an Eastern city preserves its well-groomed appearance in spite of smoky, soot-laden air, with a color scheme which does not show soil easily. The foundation color and trim are pearl gray and the shutters a medium blue. The shingled roof is stained silver gray and the porch floor is stone gray.

Bathroom Floors Should Be Strong

If you are thinking of making a bathroom out of that hall bedroom, check up on the strength of the floor to see if it will stand the weight of the contemplated fixtures. The chances are it will do very nicely; but if there is any question about it, have it strengthened before you go any further.

Frequently it is necessary to cut into some other floor joists to run the necessary piping. If it is not possible to put in deeper joists or steel beams to support the present ones, additional joists may be inserted, old ones braced, or a few Flitch plates put in.

These plates are sheets of metal bolted between two wooden joists to stiffen the wood members and help to prevent sagging.

Double Floors Keep Down Dust, Sound

Types of flooring present a problem for the home owner whether in building a new house or modernizing an old one.

Advantages of double floors are: Lessening of dust passage from the floor below; minimized sound, and prevention of warping and opening of joints in the finished floors.

Air Conditioning Changes Heating

Air conditioning, for both winter and summer, has revolutionized our conception of the functions of a heating system. There is still some confusion in the public mind as to the real meaning of the term; many think it refers merely to summer cooling. As a matter of fact, that is only one phase of it, and in the opinion of many who have studied our heating problems, a lesser one. The conditioning of the heated air in our houses in winter is far more important from a health standpoint than keeping us cool in summer.

The interest in air conditioning has brought back into favor the system of heating that was once scornfully termed "hot air." There was some justification for this unpopularity, for in the old type ashes and coal gas were distributed along with the hot, dry air, to the detriment of the silverware and the conscientious housekeeper's temper.

All that is changed now; the fire box is quite separate from the warm-air chamber and the air is warm and moist instead of being hot and dry. Air conditioning, of course, can also be combined with the boiler type of heater.

Washington Loan & Trust 50 Years Old

First Corporate Fiduciary Started In the District

The Washington Loan & Trust Co., the first corporate fiduciary to administer the estates of Washington citizens, is celebrating its fiftieth birthday.

Organized originally under a West Virginia charter in 1889, the Washington Loan & Trust Co. opened temporary offices at Tenth and F streets, pending the construction of their office building at the corner of Ninth and F, which was occupied in 1891. Meantime, Congress passed an act enabling the organization of trust companies in the Nation's Capital and a charter was secured immediately thereunder.

A group of distinguished citizens composed the first board of directors, who elected Brainard H. Warner, president. On that board was John Joy Edson, who became president in 1894 and continued in that office until 1916, when he became chairman of the board, which office he held until his death in 1935. He was succeeded as president by John B. Larner, also of the original board and active in the work of organization until his death in 1931. Thereupon, Harry G. Meem, who had been with the company since 1891, was advanced to the presidency.

Enlargement in 1912

The banking offices were enlarged and remodeled in 1912. In 1917 a branch office was opened on Seventeenth street, opposite the State, War and Navy Building and in 1924 a new building was erected there which received the medal of the Fine Arts Commission for the finest building of its type. Again in 1927 the main office building was enlarged upon adjoining properties to provide needed space for the various departments of the company.

Its many thousands of customers are in almost every country of the world and include outstanding organizations, corporations, societies and distinguished national and foreign celebrities. The growth of the trust business, as was intended, has outstripped all other departments of the company and has been accelerated in the recent past by a public realization of the advantages of corporate, experienced management of property in every form of investment. The large amount of real estate coming through estates and trusts necessitated at an early stage the formation of a real estate department which has become one of the main activities of the institution.

Foreign Exchange Department

Washington, with its cosmopolitan population, naturally demands adequate facilities for foreign exchange. So, in 1919 a foreign department was added which now serves both individuals and many other banks in the same territory.

Besides being a member of the District of Columbia and the American Bankers Association, the Washington Loan & Trust Co. is also a member of the Washington D. C. Clearing House, the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

A record of steady, continual growth is reflected by the periodic published statements of the bank as required by the Comptroller of the Currency. Deposits on December 31, 1889, were but $100,000. Today the deposits are over $24,000,000.

The original board of directors was composed of some of Washington's most distinguished citizens and the company's present board includes a former United States Senator, outstanding business and professional men as well as high ranking Army officers, newspapermen, a former justice of the Circuit Court of Virginia and men prominent in local financial circles.

A. I. B. Activities

Washington Chapter, American Institute of Banking, is beginning its thirty-ninth year with a large enrollment in the educational classes. Edward M. Blaiklock, educational chairman, said last night that the enrollment exceeded 250, divided as follows: Banking organization and operation, 77; commercial law, 57; economics II, 39; bank management, 30; and accounting, 48.

Frances E. Robey, chapter president, announced that the Public Speaking Club would start its program on October 11; a forum will be held in November; a table tennis tournament on November 16 and 17 and a dance at the Kennedy-Warren in early December.

Building League Convention

The 41 delegates from local building and loan associations returning last night from the forty-seventh annual convention of the United States Building and Loan League, in Atlantic City, N. J., were enthusiastic over their efforts in having a Washington man, Carl J. Bergmann, named for a high post in the councils of the national body. The 2,000 loan leaders gathered from all parts of the country were faced with the task of considering the merits of a number of candidates from various cities. As a director of the United States League Bergmann will have direct supervision over building and loan units in 11 States and the District of Columbia.

Grains Advance Under Stimulus Of Securities Rise

Chicago, Sept. 30 (AP).—A rally of more than two cents a bushel in wheat prices today halted the week's slump based partly on Europe's peace talk which had wiped out a good share of the September war boom advance.

Buyers re-entered the wheat and other grain pits on the stimulus of higher security prices, clearing weather over the farm belt and disquieting news from Europe indicating that peace is not in sight.

Wheat shot up more than a cent at the opening and later extended the gains to as much as 2½ cents, closing near the highs or 2⅛@2⅜ higher than yesterday. December 84½@84⅝. May 85@84⅞. Other grains followed this advance, corn closing 1⅛@1½ up. December 50⅞@51, May 53⅞@54; oats ¾@1⅜ higher; rye 1¼@1¾ up and lard 20 to 27 higher.

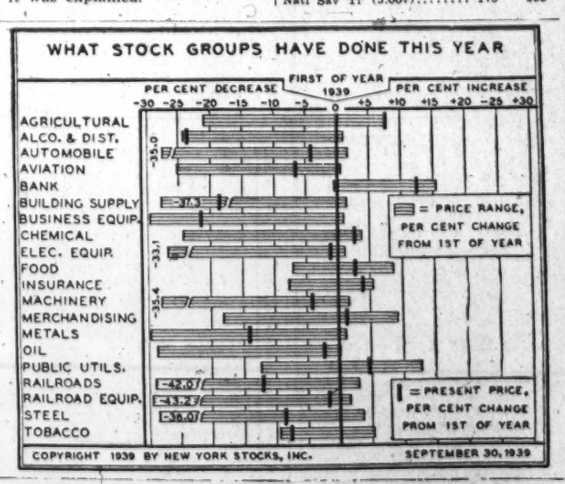
Macy's Modifies 'Cash Only' Policy

New York, Sept. 30 (INS).—R. H. Macy & Co., Inc., of New York, world's largest department store, announced today that commencing October 9, the store which since 1858 has been noted for its policy of selling only for cash, will offer a "cash-time" service, which allows customers to buy at cash prices and pay out of income. A service charge of 6 cents on each 94 cents purchased will be made. Initial payments and payment-periods will vary according to the type of merchandise purchased; payment-periods will range up to 16 months. Only purchase of wines and liquors may not be made on "cash-time," since the State law requires their sale for cash only, it was explained.



Stocks Close With Broad Rally; War Shares Are the Favorites

Steel Lead Advance in Active Trading Probability of Lengthy a War Fatcor Rail Bonds in Demand; Treasuries Droop

By Frederick Gardner,
Associated Press Financial Writer.

New York, Sept. 30.—The Stock Market wound up the week today with a broad rally in the "war infant" shares which spread to other sections of the list, more than wiping out the attrition of five preceding days of irregular or declining prices. The upsurge began with the opening and continued throughout the short session, with leaders at their best, up fractions to around 5 points, at the finish.

Business was active for a Saturday and transfers totaled 843,340 shares compared with 562,460 a week ago. The Associated Press average of 60 representative stocks climbed .9 of a point at 53.2. On the week the average gained .4 of a point. Weekly transactions totaled 8,825,290 shares against 9,663,300 in the preceding period.

Reversal of yesterday's odwnswing was attributed largely to the conviction of many traders France and Great Britain would shun the peace dove which fled from the joint Russo-German cote at Moscow Friday morning.

Long War Foreseen

Other developments in Europe pointed to a prolonged conflict should any German overtures be rejected. This was taken to mean that eventually United States manufacturers and producers of raw produts would be called upon to serve, not alone the neutral countries which have traded with the fighting nations, but the belligerents as well.

Brokers were puzzled over the implications of new diplomatic moves by Turkey and Rumania. It was reported Turkey was willing to sign mutual assistance pacts with France and Britain, with the proviso that if they fought Russia the agreements would be annulled. Then too, it was said, Turkey might promise Moscow to close the Black Sea to belligerents, thus preventing the Allies from going to the aid of Rumania where she attacked, or hitting at Germany from the south and east. Rumania sent her foreign minister to Moscow.

The Senate fight over the neutrality measure was regarded as of less importance than in the previous week. It was pointed out the present measure permits the shipment of products not regarded as implements of war to any of the hostile nations, and that there has been no move to abandon that plan. A cash-and-carry bill permitting sales of war material would permit some companies specializing in aircraft, munitions, armor plate and the like to hustle up business abroad, but, it was said, would restrict the operations of American shipping.

Steel Shares the Leaders

Steels were most favored in todays session with U. S. Steel the most active performer of the day. The fact the mill rate for the week was at its best since October, 1937, aided sentiment for this division, as did predictions that operations in most districts would increase next week. Rails were supported on the basis of estimated carloadings for the week would show a good increase, and carrier equipment shares joined in as additional huge orders poured in for them.

Heavy gainers included U. S. Steel, up 4⅝ at 78⅜, Bethlehem, at 93⅜, up 5⅞, Douglas Aircraft, 77⅞, up 3⅛, Du Pont, 184⅛, up 4¼ and Westinghouse Electric, 119½, up 3.

Ohio Oil	7,500	8⅞	+⅜
Briggs Mfg.	7,100	25⅜	+1¼

Others well forward included Chrysler, General Motors, Goodyear, International Harvester, Sperry, American Telephone, Western Union, Santa Fe, Southern Pacific, Great Northern, Pullman, Baldwin Locomotive, Westinghouse Air Brake, Briggs Mfg., Electric Auto Lite, Anaconda, Union Carbide and Allied Chemical.

Monday was a quiet day in the market with prices irregular, but on Tuesday an attempt was made to hand the leadership to the rails. They pulled the list into a little higher ground but by Wednesday their rule was disputed and shares, on peace rumors, began to drift downward. The tendency lasted until today's broad uplift.

Jones & Laughlin shot up 4⅝ in the curb and smaller gains were scored by American Cynamid "B," Bliss Corporation, Humble Oil and Beech Aircraft. Turnover of 95,000 shares, compared with 88,000 a week ago.

Rail and Power Bonds High

Railway issues, selected utilities and some industrial loans forged upward in the bond market today, closing with gains of fractions to 2 or more among the leaders.

United States Government issues, after rising tendencies in the preceding four days, turned weak in the short Saturday two-hour session, however, and ended with losses as wide in some instances as 30-32nds. Many foreign dollar bonds also turned downward as war reports from abroad continued unsettling. Transactions aggregated $5,532,275, face value, compared with $6,072,950 last Saturday.

New York Central 5s closed at 69, up 2¼. Around 1 and 2 higher were Erie 5s of '75 at 19, Great Northern 5s of '48 "G" at 108⅛; Illinois Central 4⅜s at 52⅞; Missouri-Kansas-Texas 5s of '62 at 28½; International Hydro Electric 6s at 70; Commonwealth Edison convertible 3½ at 115; Studebaker 6s at 93½, and Penn Dixie Cement 6s at 95.

On the other hand, 1 or more lower were American Telephone 3⅛s of '66 at 100; Shell Union 2½s at 90, and Walworth 4s at 57½.

Canadian 4s of '60 at 87¾ were down 2¼ among the foreigns, and Australian 4½s of '56 at 65½ lost 2½.

Penn. to Remodel 85 Steel Coaches

Philadelphia, Sept. 30.—For the purpose of further augmenting its fleet of advanced type passenger cars, and to anticipate additional increases in travel, the Pennsylvania Railroad announced today the complete remodeling of 85 all-steel coaches.

While the framework and structural parts of the present cars will be retained, the interiors will be entirely new and will embody the most modern features of equipment, arrangements and appointments for convenience and comfort in travel.

D. S. Hendrick New Partner in Hibbs & Co.

Old Brokerage Firm Admits Brother of Its Senior Partner

The admission of David S. Hendrick to partnership in W. B. Hibbs & Co., members of the New York Stock Exchange with headquarters in Washington, was announced yesterday by J. Thilman Hendrick, senior partner in the firm.

Mr. Hendrick attended the public schools of this city, graduated from Georgetown Law school in 1909 and was admitted to the District of Columbia Bar in that year. He was one of the pioneer automobile distributors, having entered that field in 1910. He successfuily managed his own firm in the distribution and financing of automobiles until his retirement a few years ago. He is a member of Columbia Country Club, the University Club and Delta Chi Fraternity.

The firm of W. B. Hibbs & Co., has been in existence for more than 50 years, having been founded by W. B. Hibbs who died two years ago. The firm holds memberships on the New York Stock Exchange, the New York Curb Exchange, the New York Cotton Exchange, the Chicago Board of Trade and the Washington Stock Exchange.

J. Thilman Hendrick, present senior partner, is also chairman of the board of the Lanston Monotype Machine Co., of Philadelphia, and has been a member of the Washington Stock Exchange for more than thirty years. He served as a member of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia during the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

The addition of David S. Hendrick gives the firm a total of five partners. The three other partners, J. Carl Perry, James C. Elgin and Paul P. Rodier, have been associated with the firm for more than twenty years, and all three hold memberships on the Washington Stock Exchange.

Body Is Identified As Missing Farmer Of Taylorsville

Frederick, Md., Sept. 30 (AP).—Clothing found near a man's bones in the Unionville neighborhood was identified today as belonging to Andrew Lee Cain, a Taylorsville farmer, who disappeared 16 months ago.

Woodrow and Raymond Cain, sons of the missing man, said the tattered coat, a shoe and a belt buckle found near the body were those worn by their father. They also said a rusty pistol, tied to a tree near his body, had belonged to Cain. They said their father was 63; medical experts had already estimated the age of the dead man as 55-60.

The sons said their father vanished May 28, 1938.

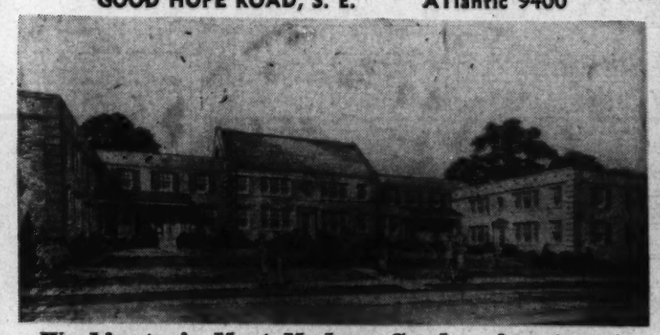
Skyland
GOOD HOPE ROAD, S. E. ATlantic 9400



Washington's Most Modern Garden Apartments Alone Can Offer You All These Features

★ LOCATION
Skyland tops one of the highest ridges in the District. Nearly every apartment commands a breath-taking view of the Capitol and the Mall—an unexcelled panorama of Greater Washington and the Virginia hills.

★ SUMMER COMFORT
Every apartment has two or three exposures taking advantage of the ever-present breeze prevalent at this altitude.

★ ENVIRONMENT
The Colonial charm that has been woven into this huge development of apartment homes (there are 323 family units) contributes to a beautiful, restful environment. The carefully kept grounds, the lack of any suggestion of rear yards or alleys, the management's self-imposed standards of tenant selectivity . . . these are lasting safeguards.

★ SERVICES
Every living comfort is provided at Skyland. Included is a 24-hour switchboard service, with free connection to seven stores in the shopping center; a package receiving room, free package delivery, garbage collection, a large lounge available for meetings or private parties—these are but a few of the amenities enjoyed at Skyland.

★ SPACIOUSNESS
Not only are the rooms large and airy, but the thirteen acres of landscaped, rolling ground that form the setting for Skyland are threaded with more than a mile of winding walks and three fully equipped playgrounds.

★ CONVENIENCE
Skyland is close to schools, churches, theaters, buses and major employment centers. It is easily accessible from downtown (see map).

It's Community Chest season again, and Mrs. J. Blaide de Sibour, above, does a bit of checking (she probably has your name on her list) at a Community Chest meeting. Above, right, Mrs. Wilson Lee, chairman of the luncheon committee, also looks busy. The annual drive will begin in earnest on Monday, October 16, at the keynote luncheon at the Mayflower Hotel

Buds and Brides Set Pace in Social Whirl

Keep Calendar in Full Swing Despite Lag in Diplomatic Parties; Betrothal Of Helen Lee Washington Announced

By Hope Ridings Miller.

The Post Society Editor.

ON THE SOCIAL FRONT: With Mrs. Roosevelt's recent hint that White House functions may be curtailed this season, and with diplomatic parties becoming rarer by the minute, it seems to be up to the buds, brides, and brides-to-be to keep the calendar in full swing.

More numerous this year than ever before in Washington's history, Capital debutantes already are centering the spotlight. Brides also have had their share of attention; and now comes an engagement of special interest both here and abroad.

Mrs. Horace Lee Washington, of this city, announced the betrothal of her daughter, Helen Lee, to Arthur Norris Kennard, only son of Sir Howard and Lady Kennard, of Langham House, Rode, Somerset. Until the outbreak of war, Sir Howard was British Ambassador at Warsaw, having been at that post since 1935.

MISS WASHINGTON'S FATHER, the late Horace Lee Washington, served as United States Consul-General in London. He was related to the families of both George Washington and Robert E. Lee. Mrs. Washington is the former Helen Stewart Williams, a granddaughter of Gen. Hart L. Stewart, of Chicago, and a cousin of the late George M. Pullman.

The bride-elect attended the North Foreland School in Kent, England, and the Fermata School at Aiken, S. C. She was presented at the Court of St. Jame's before making her debut in Washington and in Baltimore. According to present plans, she will sail soon for England, where the wedding will take place.

Mr. Kennard was educated at Eton and at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. His mother is the former Harriet Norris, daughter of Jonathan Norris, of New York. Both she and Sir Howard are widely known in Washington, as he served for a time as second secretary at the British Embassy.

AT HOME AND ABROAD: Europe's war clouds have brought about a noticeable change in activity, both for local citizens and Americans living abroad. Many of the latter flocked back to these shores as quickly as they could obtain passage. Others have taken to rolling bandages and sewing for soldiers with as much of a will as if this country were already in the war.

From Norway comes word that our indefatigable minister, Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, has posters up all over Oslo announcing that a Red Cross sewing unit is at work at the United States Legation each Tuesday. Washingtonians will remember that the beloved "Daisy" headed a Red Cross motor brigade in the last war and that getting into saddle for "a cause" is almost second nature with her.

CAPITAL SKETCHBOOK: Although the most permanent thing about Washington is its continually changing scene, some of us never will get accustomed to departures of Favorite People. Take the retiring Swiss Minister and Mme. Peter, for example. In Washington since 1920, they have long been considered fixtures in the Capital picture. But this very week they will shake the dust of Washington from their feet, returning only briefly for a final farewell.

On Tuesday or Wednesday, they will be off to Boston where they have taken an apartment to be near their sons, Marc Peter, jr., and Georges Peter, both of whom are married to American girls. The middle of the month, they expect to come back for a short stay in order to say good-by to their many friends who have not returned from

Mrs. Reginald S. Huidekoper, one of the members of the Community Chest League luncheon committee, snapped as she was leaving the home of Mrs. James Clement Dunn at Observatory circle following a recent meeting there. In the circle at right, the hostess, Mrs. Dunn, does part of her league work by telephone. Under the directorship of Mrs. Lee, the committee has rounded up business and civic leaders, Government officials and prominent society leaders to take part in the coming Community Chest drive. Always one of Washington's favorite causes, the Community Chest season looms especially large on the Capital calendar in a year when social events for causes rather than for mere pleasure are the thing of the hour. Among others taking active part in the drive are Mrs. Charles Carroll Glover, jr., who is chairman of the Chest League Motor Corps, assisted by Mrs. Montgomery Blair, jr.

Envoy's Wife Entertains At Luncheon

Senora de Pastoriza Gives Party for Senora de Trujillo

Senora de Pastoriza, wife of the Dominican Minister, entertained at a large luncheon yesterday at the Mayflower in honor of Senora de Trujillo, wife of the former President of the Dominican Republic, Gen. Rafael L. Trujillo. They are in Washington briefly en route to Miami, whence they will embark for San Domingo.

The guests were headed by Senora de Espil, wife of the Argentine Ambassador, and Mrs. Cordell Hull, wife of the Secretary of State. Others were Senora de Cabero, Mme. Bianchi, Senora de Castro, Senora de Castro Beeche, Senora de Recinos, Senora de Guachalla, Senora de De Bayle, Senora de Fuentes, Senora de Caceres, Senora de Insfran, Mrs. Claude Pepper, Mrs. William King, Mrs. Hamilton Fish, Mrs. Dion Williams, Mrs. Parker West, Senora de Garland, Senora de Zanni, Senora de Puig de Alfaro, Senora Valdez Rodriguez, Senora de Munilla, Senora de Fombona-Pachano, Senora de Briceno, Senora de Gazitua and Mrs. Warren Lee Pierson.

Also Mrs. Selden Chapin, Mrs. Charles Spruks, Mrs. Edward J. Sparks, Mrs. Willard Barber, Mrs. E. O. Briggs, Mrs. Laurence Duggan, Mrs. Thomas Burke, Mrs. W. E. Pulliam, Mrs. Pedro de Arcaya, Mrs. Frederick Benton, Mrs. Tomas Cajigas, Mrs. Abner Drury, Mrs. Ulises Espaillat, Mrs. Clarence Grosner, Mrs. O. B. Hydrick, Mrs. Consuelo Seone, Mrs. Fred Britten, Mrs. S. A. Maginnis, Mrs. Charles McEnerney, Mrs. H. L. Larsen and Mrs. Thomas Watson.

Mrs. Cordell Hull To Receive Award From Va. College

Mrs. Cordell Hull will leave Tuesday for Staunton, Va., where on Wednesday she will receive the Algernon Sydney Sullivan award at the Founder's Day ceremony at Mary Baldwin College.

The honor is bestowed annually on "one who has distinguished herself." Following the ceremony there will be a large reception at which Mrs. Hull will be honor guest.

During her visit in Staunton, Mrs. Hull will be with her niece, Mrs. Paul Hays. According to present plans, Mrs. Hull will return to Washington Thursday or Friday.

War Has Its Effect on Capital Society; Few Talk of It, but Many Change Plans

DEPARTURE FROM THE NORM on the other side of the Atlantic and its effect on Washington society becomes more and more apparent. While conversation at cocktail parties carefully steers clear of the European situation in general, there is a constant influx of news concerning the abrupt change of plans of capitalites and their friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Lawson Johnson arrived from England Wednesday for an indefinite stay with the latter's daughter and son-in-law, Jane and George Grant Mason . . . Word from London, where the Theodore Achilles were transferred to our embassy there last spring, informs us that Marian, accompanied by her children, has left London for safety in the country. Whether or not she will have to return to this country any time soon is still unknown . . . The same is true of Wahwee Barkley MacArthur, who has moved out of Paris, where Doug is secretary in the American Embassy . . .

Lady Rutter, the former Lillian Hendricks, of Washington, and aunt to popular Bambie McKenna, is faced with a different problem. She came to America a few days ago to put her son in school here and is now finding it extremely difficult to get back, where she is anxious to do her part. She informs us that there are 10,000 English women

New Canadian Envoy Is No Stranger to D. C.

Christie Held Post in United States Department of Justice Before World War; Attended Harvard Law School

By Carolyn Bell.

IT TAKES JUST A SHORT chat with the new Canadian Minister to convince one that Americans—and American customs—hold no terrors for this gentleman who possesses the lilting name of Loring Cheney Christie. He not only lived in Washington for three years before the last war but held a position in the United States Department of Justice—not as a G-man we hasten to add!

Arriving at the somewhat forbidding legation on Massachusetts avenue we were promptly ushered into his study, where he confesses to have burned the midnight oil, on more than one occasion, since his arrival one week ago. In other times, less fraught with anxiety, Mr. Christie might be dubbed a "glamour boy." But in this man, who has such a tremendous job ahead of him, the strength of his chin and his grave mien overshadow the crisp gray curls and eyes that twinkle when he is amused. Dressed in a conservative blue suit, the Minister leaned back in his swivel chair and smoked with a long cigarette holder as we plied him with questions.

IT SEEMS THAT the Minister brought his ice skates along with the rest of his luggage. Quite an expert at figure eights and the like, he was surprised to learn that Washington could now boast of a bona fide rink. Just whether the hard-working diplomat will get a chance to try out his skates on our rink is another story—but he came prepared, nevertheless.

Skiing is another favorite sport with Mrs. Christie, but "I could hardly be called an expert," he said. It is quite a delight to the American diplomats, says the envoy, to find excellent skiing just 25 minutes outside of Ottawa. Several fishing lakes are an added charm because they too are so close to the Capital of Canada.

Ottawa has rather a "small town" air about it in contrast to Washington. It is more like the prewar Washington that Mr. Christie knew—a quiet, peaceful village. Naturally the war will curtail all official social functions in Ottawa. He is not quite sure that the stepped-up tempo of our Capital appeals to him.

WHY DID Mr. Christie receive the top-flight diplomatic post? One would suppose his all-around education was his first asset. He received his B. A. from Acadia University and was graduated from Harvard Law School, where he was editor in chief of the Harvard Law Review. In 1910 Attorney General George Wickersham offered him a position with the United States Department of Justice as a lawyer. His work here was entirely of a professional nonpolitical character.

At the outbreak of the last World War Mr. Christie became confidential assistant to Sir Robert Borden. As technical adviser to the Canadian delegation he accompanied Sir Robert to all the imperial war and war cabinet conferences. Before his recent appointment as Minister here Mr. Christie was with the Department of External Affairs as counsellor.

THE HANDSOME Minister is renewing friendships as fast as a busy diplomat can. Among his old friends—and this is a coincidence—is Lord Lothian, newly arrived British Ambassador. They met in London and were fellow associates on the editorial committee of the Round Table Quarterly, a well known publication dealing with imperial and international affairs.

A suave Handler of the Press is the Canadian gentleman. And well he should be for he spent his university vacation days as temporary editor of The Amherst Daily News. There he was combination reporter, make-up man and editor. So you see! Mr. Christie "was once a newspaper man himself."

Roberto Boisson Marries Miss Boughner at St. John's

Church Flower-Decked as Rev. Acton Unites Couple; Bride Is Descendant of An Early Commodore of American Navy

DECKED WITH chrysanthemums, dahlias and oak leaves, St. John's Church was the scene of the marriage of Miss Elaine Terry Boughner and Roberto Boisson y Sanz at 6 o'clock last night.

The Rev. Nathaniel Acton officiated at the ceremony. A reception followed at the Congressional Country Club. The bride is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Gray Boughner, of Confluence, Pa. Senor Boisson is the son of the late Senor Guillermo and Senora de Lucila Sanz, of Madrid, Spain.

Given in marriage by her brother, Daniel T. Boughner, the bride wore an ivory satin gown with Edwardian sleeves and turned down high collar decked with clusters of orange blossoms. The waist of the frock was encircled with a corselet girdle with deep points front and back and a bouffant skirt with a flounce of unpressed pleats at the knee worn over a hoop ending in a long train.

Her ivory illusion veil fell from a coronet of seed pearls in filigree medallions. She carried a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley and gardenias.

Miss Virgilia Stephens served as maid of honor. She wore a petunia velvet gown with tight bodice, short puffed sleeves, square neck and a corded bouffant skirt. Her bonnet of fuchsia ostrich tips was of Eugenie inspiration. She carried an arm bouquet of Talisman roses and purple boudleia.

THE OTHER attendants were Miss Emily Rose, Mrs. Helen Lyons, Miss Muriel Faherty, Mrs. Atha Jordon, Miss Regina Faherty and Mrs. Daniel T. Boughner.

They wore gowns like those of the maid of honor shading from delphinium to deep blue. Their cyclamen toques were of feathers and they carried arm bouquets of American Beauty roses.

Miss Barbara Cash, cousin of the bride, attended as flower girl. Her gown of colonial style was in peach velvet.

Senor Luis Boissony-Sanz attended as best man for his brother. Ushers were Senor Hernando Cabrera, Rex Wever, Justin Cash, Austin Carr, George Roper and Lawrence Elwin.

Assisting at the reception was the bride's mother. Her grape velvet gown had a silver belt and draped skirt. She wore matching accessories and a corsage of orchids and lilies of the valley.

WHEN THE COUPLE left for their honeymoon the bride wore a blue wool costume suit trimmed in sable dyed skunk. Her corsage was of yellow roses.

After October 15 they will be at home at 4618 Reno road.

Among the out-of-town guests were Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Offutt, of Oakland, Md.; Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Galloway, of Baltimore, Md.; Mr. and Mrs. Daniel T. Boughner, of McKeesport, Pa., and Mr. and Mrs. Justin C. Cash, of Baltimore.

The bride is a descendant of Commodore James Nicholson, an early commodore of the American Navy. She is great, grandniece of Albert Gallatin, second Secretary of the Treasury.

Senor Boisson is the youngest descendant of the old family Sanz-Lujan, of Spain. He is great grandnephew of Gregorio Palma, Governor of Cuba. He is also great grandnephew of Felipe Lujan, Undersecretary of War in Spain. The bridegroom attended the University of Alcala de Henares, the Royal Conservatory and the University of Madrid.

Collins-Dunlap Nuptials Are Announced

Announcement has been made of the marriage last April 22 of Miss Sara Elizabeth Collins, to the Rev. Harry Philip Dunlap. The ceremony took place in the Bethel Lutheran Church, Manassas, Va., the Rev. A. W. Ballentine officiating.

Mrs. Dunlap, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Elverson Collins, of Cumberland, Md., is a graduate of Strayer College, in Washington. She is past president of the Theta Chapter, Tau Beta Phi, and also served as national recording secretary for the last two years. She has been employed several years with the Department of Labor.

The bridegroom is the son of the late Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dunlap, of Lancaster, Pa. He is a graduate of Muhlenberg College, where he was also a member of Eta Sigma Phi and Phi Alpha Theta; the Mount Airy Lutheran Seminary, in Philadelphia, and the Union Theological Seminary, in New York. He is a clergyman in the United Lutheran Church.

Miss Helen Eugene Collins, sister of Mrs. Dunlap, entertained at a large tea in the Chinese Room of the Mayflower recently in honor of the couple.

Katherine Ryan Is Married to John Payne

Rep. Randolph Is Best Man in Ceremony At Schenectady, N. Y.

An out-of-town wedding of interest to Washington was that of Miss Katherine Virginia Ryan, of Exeter, Calif., to John Howard Payne, of Washington, which took place yesterday at 4:30 at the First Reformed Church in Schenectady, N. Y. The Rev. Clark V. Poling officiated at the 4:30 ceremony.

Representative Jennings Randolph, of West Virginia, was best man. Miss Reba Stevens, of Schenectady, was maid of honor, and the bride's sisters, Mrs. Earle Harris, of Schenectady, and Mrs. Paul Breski, of Waterford, N. Y., were bridesmaids. Ushers were Willard Boise, of Schenectady; Noel Kaho and J. Wade Dorsett, of Washington, and Vincent C. Butsch, of Schenectady.

The bride, who is a graduate of Beaver College, N. Y., was given away by her brother, Robert E. Ryan. She is the daughter of Mrs. Walter d'Arcy Ryan and the late Mr. Ryan. The latter was chief illuminating engineer for the General Electric Co. and planned the illuminating systems for such world-famous places as the Chicago World's Fair in 1934 and Vienna, Austria. The lighting system in the Union Station, in the Capital, also was designed by Mr. Ryan.

The bridegroom is a graduate of Union College, the gates of which were erected in honor of his ancestor, John Howard Payne, who wrote "Home, Sweet Home." Young Mr. Payne is a well-known economist feature writer for the Capital Daily.

Newly-Wed Bells Feted

Mr. and Mrs. George Tillman Bell, jr., whose marriage took place in New York on September 22, were guests of honor at a tea given yesterday afternoon by the bridegroom's parents, Mr. and Mrs. George Tillman Bell, at their home at 2718 Thirty-second street.

Mrs. Bell, jr., is the former Miss Florence Buckwalter, who has a number of Washington friends with whom she formerly studied at the Sorbonne in Paris and in New York. She and her husband will leave this afternoon for Hartford, Conn., where they will make their home.

About a hundred guests attended yesterday's tea. Those assisting the hostess included Mrs. Henry J. Richardson, Mrs. Rudolph Harrell, Miss Anne Tuohy, Mrs. Leslie Prince, Mrs. W. L. Beale and Mrs. L. H. Hedrick.

The party, arranged primarily for the bride and bridegroom, was also in the nature of a farewell fete for the host and hostess. They have leased their house to the Naval Attache of the Italian Embassy and the Marchioness of Sant 'Orsola, and will leave tomorrow for Florida, going on later to Mexico.

Charles Davises Wed 50 Years

After celebrating their golden wedding anniversary at a party on September 23, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. David left for a second honeymoon, this time to St. Petersburg and Miami, Fla.

The party was held at their residence, 215 Cedar street, Takoma Park. Assisting were Mrs. Myers Hand and Mrs. Robert S. Leedy, and among the guests were Dr. George M. Beckett, who served as best man at the marriage, Mrs. Beckett, and the daughter and son of Mr. and Mrs. Davis; Mrs. William W. Adams, Mr. Adams, and Myers R. Davis and Mrs. Davis.

A mock wedding was performed by several young friends of the family, including Myers Robert Davis, grandson of the couple, Irene Perkett, and Jane, Barbara Jean and Helen Ann Bigelow. Their costumes, copies of the originals worn by Mr. and Mrs. Davis at their wedding, were designed by Mrs. G. L. Atkins.

pilots in service behind the front . . . British John Hamlin, Jim Mitchell's antique shop partner, planned to return from his homeland this fall armed with a fresh collection for their enterprise. We now hear that he will not come back, but has taken up his duties in the British navy . . .

CONCERNING DIPLOMATS IN GENERAL:

Margot and Mariano Zuberbuhler are coming to Washington. They are now in Panama, where Mariano was sent by the Argentine government to attend the Pan-American conference, and as soon as the conference is over, they will dash up here to their old stamping grounds for a visit . . . Emily and Elbridge Durbrow left this last week for Chicago where Durby will study at the University of Chicago in his capacity as foreign service officer . . . Mr. and Mrs. John Hamlin, who were transferred to American consulate in Seville last summer, have a gorgeous villa there. It was built for an exposition and is a modern show place . . . The Homer Byingtons (Mrs. Byington was formerly Jane McHarg from the home town) write from their present post, Belgrade, Yugoslavia, that they have seen a good deal of Nicky Perazic and the Ivan Franjes.

MORE ABOUT BACHELORS: Concerning the stag line we continue to educate the debutantes . . . Charlie Gaines—he's easy to meet in that easy-going and thoroughly agreeable manner characteristic of Southerners; has unfailing sense of humor which means that it applies to himself as well . . . Bob Waggaman—always on the qui vive; an excellent host and one of those men who is thoughtfully aware that an occasional posy or dinner party favor is deeply appreciated; has an eye for feminine charm . . . Will Ryan—exceedingly generous and entertains in the grand manner; has that rare quality of being a true friend . . . Clem Conger—always in high spirits; likes vivacious chatter and smooth dancing; will probably razz you, but he can also take it . . .

AMONG PLEASANT PARTIES of the last week was the one given by Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Holdrege on Thursday. A fete for Florence Harris and Donald Downs, who will walk down the aisle on October 17, the event was one of the first given for this popular couple. Guests included Count de Gramont, Attache of the French Embassy, who informed us that he expects to be recalled this month for war service.

Miss Dailey, Dr. Harrison Married Here

Couple Will Make Home in Washington After Florida Trip

THE WEDDING of Miss Sadye Belle Dailey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Henry Dailey, of of Blanche, N. C., to Dr. Malcolm Douglas Harrison, son of Mr. and Mrs. Judson O. Harrison, of Forest Hills, took place at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon in the Metropolitan Memorial Methodist Church. The Rev. William A. Keese officiated in a setting of palms, gladioli, chrysanthemums and ferns.

The bride was given in marriage by her brother, Percy N. Dailey, of Reidsville, N. C. Her gown was a Schiaparelli model of ivory slipper satin with long sleeves and a full circular train. Her veil fell from a juliet cap of satin, tulle and orange blossoms, and she carried a shower bouquet of orchids, gardenias and lilies of the valley.

MRS. TAYLOR SNEAD, of Yanceyville, N. C., sister of the bride, served as matron of honor, wearing a rose moire frock with short puffed sleeves and carrying Johanna Hill roses. The bridesmaids were Mrs. Judson O. Harrison, jr., Miss Mabel Bruce and Miss Dorothy Rasasco, all of Washington, and Miss Pearl Sledge, of Yanceyville. They wore moire frocks, two in blue and two in a peach bloom shade, trimmed with matching lace and velvet ribbon and carried roses. Virginia Lee Dailey, the bride's niece, was flower girl, gowned in a pink taffeta dress with a halo of roses in her hair and carrying a basket of pink rose petals.

Judson O. Harrison, jr., of this city served as best man for his brother, and the ushers were Dr. Richard Earle de Butts, J. Raymond Anderson, Walter L. Blake and Dr. Hiram Thomas Langston.

A RECEPTION at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison followed the ceremony. Mrs. Dailey wore a black chiffon and lace dress with a corsage of orchids and the bridegroom's mother was in black silk marquisette with orchids.

Later the couple left by motor for a trip to Florida, the bride wearing a green wool traveling suit with kolinsky fur and a corsage of orchids and lilies of the valley. They will make their home at 4540 Forty-ninth street, Washington.

Well to the Front in the Ranks of the Debs

Harris & Ewing

Who's afraid of the big, bad lion? Certainly not Miss Margaret Fleetwood Gordon, above. Miss Gordon, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John B. Gordon, will make her debut this fall at a party during the Christmas holidays. At right is Miss Joan McKenna, who will be presented at a dance on December 28 by her grandmother, Mrs. David Stewart Hendrick. Miss McKenna is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Royal T. McKenna

Slipping out instead of coming out this season, but very much a member of the debutante group, will be Miss Patricia Sterling Prochnik, daughter of the former Austrian Minister and Mme. Prochnik. Miss Prochnik, American-born Austrian, visited her native country for the first time two summers ago. Together with the other two buds in the group, Miss Prochnik will probably be one of the leading debutantes of the coming season

Lorraine Higgins Becomes Bride

Wearing a slate-blue dress, instead of the conventional white, Miss Lorraine Bernice Higgins, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William I. Higgins, was married yesterday afternoon to Wilmer R. Haack, of Lincoln, Nebr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Haack.

The ceremony took place at 4 o'clock at the Foundry Methodist Church, the Rev. Frederick Brown Harris officiating. The bride's gown had long sleeves and a bustle, and she topped off her ensemble with a Dubonnet hat and a corsage of rosebuds.

Her only attendant was Miss Ruth Snyder, of Bloomville, Ohio, who wore a brown costume with matching accessories. Werner Krause, of Kansas City, was best man.

The bride attended high school in Orlando, Fla., and the Orlando Vocational School and Rollins Conservatory of Music. Mr. Haack, who attended the Lincoln School of Commerce, is with the United States Civil Service Commission.

On their return from a motor trip to Niagara Falls, the couple will be at home after October 11 at 1701 Massachusetts avenue.

Andrienne Nichols' Engagement Anonunced

At a buffet supper at their home, 4415 Fifteenth street, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Nichols announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Adrienne Nichols, to Paul Constantine, son of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Constantine, of New London, Conn.

The date of the wedding is indefinite, as Miss Nichols is a junior at Maryland University, and Mr. Constantine is a member of the same class at New York University.

Polly Montague's Wedding to Be Social Event

MR. AND MRS. PRINGLE SMITH of Charleston, S. C., owners of the famous Middleton Gardens, will arrive on Tuesday to visit Mr. and Mrs. William Poindexter Montague at their home in Middleburg. They will stay on to attend the wedding of their cousin, Miss Polly Montague and H. Gwynne Tayloe, jr., which will take place next Saturday afternoon, in Emmanuel Episcopal Church in Middleburg. There will be a reception afterwards at the Montagues' home.

The wedding will be one of the outstanding social events of the month in the hunt country. Mr. and Mrs. George R. Gaither will give a large dinner party in honor of the prospective bride and bridegroom on Friday night.

Last night Mr. Tayloe gave his bachelor dinner at the home of Henry Skinner near The Plains. Mrs. Frank C. Littleton, jr., who will be matron of honor for her sister, entertained at a ladies' dinner party in honor of the bride-elect.

THE FARMINGTON Hunt Club Horse Show will be held at the Farmington Club Horse Show Grounds on Friday and Saturday. Among those riding in the show will be Franklin D. Roosevelt, jr., who is a member of, and hunts with, the Farmington Hunt Club.

The horse show committee is composed of Llewellyn Miller, chairman; Miss Judy Molter, secretary; Mrs. J. P. Jones and Rodger Rhinehart, joint masters of Farmington Hunt; Howard Y. Haffner and Truman Dodson. Elaborate plans have been made for the two-day affair which is expected to attract sportsmen from all over the East.

THE ENTERTAINMENT committee includes Mrs. Randolph Catlin, Mrs. J. S. Galban, Mrs. Robert Schlesinger, Mrs. Marshall Field 2nd and Mrs. Truman Dodson.

Thirty-two classes are included on the program and the show starts each morning at 9 o'clock. Afternoon sessions will open at 2 o'clock following luncheon recess. There will be many picnic luncheons given on the grounds, dinner parties each night and a dance at the Farmington Country Club on Saturday night.

MR. AND MRS. CONWAY COE, of Washington, who have been spending the summer at Joannasburg, near Bluemont, have returned from a visit to Canada and New York where they attended the World's Fair. Although the Coe children, Peyton, Anne and Mildred, have entered Friends School for the season they motored up to Bluemont this week-end with their parents. The Coes plan week-end jaunts to their place in the Blue Ridge mountains all through the month of October.

summer vacations. Originally they had planned to be here through October, but since the new Swiss Minister, Charles Bruggmann, is due to arrive next week, they are going earlier. Since their return from a vacation in Maine, they have been staying at the Anchorage.

I'VE NEVER KNOWN a diplomatic couple with more friends than the Peters. Their home here, a veritable storehouse of fine books and paintings, was the scene of parties that guests never forgot, and Mme. Peter's invitations, therefore, were highly prized. Both the Minister and Mme. Peter are music enthusiasts; were regular attendants at concerts during their entire stay in Washington, and rarely missed any party of importance.

They will be missed here in both art and social circles. Personally, I can't imagine the town without them. But perhaps they will come back from time to time. Washington hopes so.

Annapolis Opens Autumn Football Season

First Game at Annapolis Celebrated By Many Parties

YESTERDAY WAS MARKED by the first football game of the season at the United States Naval Academy. The usual throng of out-of-town guests was in Annapolis to see the Navy play William and Mary. Last night the first officers' hop of the season took place at the Naval Academy Officers' Club. Several Navy hostesses entertained preceding this event.

Several parties preliminary to the opening of the fall social season in Annapolis took place in the last week. Saturday, September 23, a supper party in compliment to Capt. and Mrs. Max de Mott was given by Commodore and Mrs. Leonard Austin at their quarters in Upshur road. Capt. de Mott, who recently completed a tour of duty here, is now in command of the U. S. S. Helena in New York. He came to Annapolis for the week-end to join Mrs. de Mott who has not yet left for New York.

Last week was notable for the return of many Navy people who have been vacationing on the West Coast, in New England, or abroad.

MRS. CLEVELAND McCAULEY, wife of Commodore McCauley, of Farmlands, Arnold, is back from a four-month stay in Europe. She made the trip with Mrs. Joseph A. Moore, of New York. They visited Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland and Germany, stopping in the different embassies and legations to see friends who were stationed there.

Capt. and Mrs. Franklin D. Karns have returned from a four-month visit to the West Coast, where they were guests of their son-in-law and daughter, Lieut. and Mrs. W. C. Schutlz. Lieut. Schultz is communications officer on the staff of Admiral Gilbert J. Rowcliff, of the U. S. S. Chicago.

Capt. and Mrs. H. A. Baldridge returned this week after a six-week trip to Canada and Northern States. They included Murray Bay, Montreal and Quebec in their tour, visited friends in Maine and in Newport, and were guests of Mrs. Baldridge's mother, Mrs. R. G. Smith, in Sayville, L. I.

MAYOR OF ANNAPOLIS and Mrs. George W. Haley, who were married recently, have returned from their wedding trip, a cruise on Chesapeake Bay. They are living at The Cooper in Maryland avenue.

Mrs. Mollie Taylor, of Philadelphia, is the guest of her brother-in-law and sister, Dr. and Mrs. George T. Feldmeyer, of Murray Hill.

Mr. and Mrs. A. H. MacCarthy, who have been spending the summer at their summer home near Sheffield, Mass., have returned to Annapolis for the winter, bringing with them Mrs. W. E. Stone as their house guest.

Prof. and Mrs. Richard Kuehnemund have returned to their home in King George street after spending the summer in South Bridgton, Me.

THE WEDDING OF Miss Beverly Brown, daughter of Mr. DeWitt Brown, of Annapolis, to Willard Hoy Maier, son of Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Maier, of Tunnelton, W. Va., took place here on Saturday afternoon, September 23, in the Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church. The Rev. E. Cranston Riggin, performed the ceremony.

Mrs. Anthony J. Wyvill, of Washington, was her niece's matron of honor and only attendant. Vincent Maier, of Washington, was best man for his brother. Ushers included Kenneth Duckett, of Annapolis; a cousin of the bride, and Ralph Wiles, of Cumberland.

Immediately after the wedding, a reception was held at the home of the bride's uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Duckett, Spa View Circle. After a wedding trip to Niagara and Canada, Mr. and Mrs. Maier will reside in Raleigh, N. C., where the bridegroom has a position with the Seaboard Railway.

Society Women Do Succeed After All In Business—Viz.: Mme. Prochnik

WHILE IT'S DIFFICULT to be taken seriously in the business or artistic world when one has money and/or social position, in Washington society there are many outstanding women who have achieved reputations in both. As writers, painters, musicians, or saleswomen they have made successes out of careers in which one is traditionally supposed to have starved in a garrett for a while before making one's mark. To see them at a tea, beautifully dressed and charming, you would never think they had any other interest than home, family, and whether or not to get one of the new Goya dresses.

In this column, beginning today and continuing once a week, we propose to sketch some of these clever ladies and tell how they got that way.

WHEN Mme. Edgar Prochnik presided over the handsome stone building on Massachusetts avenue which was formerly the Austrian Legation, she never thought that some day she would swap her occupation of writing out invitations for that of making out neat bills and receipts for customers. And nobody seeing this pretty, petite hostess dressed in a becoming, trailing green velvet tea gown would have thought her a type to do much more than turn on charm at parties. They might have received a clew to her capabilities if they'd asked where she got her lovely gown, for she would have replied that she made it herself.

When fortunes changed, and there was suddenly no Austrian Legation any more, this erstwhile diplomatic hostess wasn't pheased a bit. It wasn't for nothing that for years she had made with her own hands every stitch of her clothing and that of her two pretty daughters. When necessity made it advisable to suplement the family income, she went into the lingerie business.

IT IS EXACTLY a year since Mme. Prochnik became Washington representative for a well-known firm, and now she is branching out. This season she will represent a California sportswear company and has started a thriving business with a Swiss firm which makes handerchiefs.

"At first I hated asking my friends if they'd buy something," says Mme. Prochnik, "but now I don't mind it and love my business." Many of her most faithful customers are men, who would rather be hung by their thumbs than go into a lingerie shop and buy Christmas or birthday presents for their wives. They gratefully turn the whole problem over to Mme. Prochnik, and all they have to do is pay the bill.

Oddly enough, neither of Mme. Prochnik's daughters, Mrs. John de Sibour or Miss Patricia Prochnik, can even sew on buttons, though they tried hard. She still makes all their clothes and can run them up an evening dress for all of $12. She studied clothes designing as a young lady and someday would like to concentrate on that.

FEW CAPITAL PARTIES would be complete without the presence of a tall, handsome woman who always wears a cluster of white carnations pinned to her black frock. She is Mrs. Eldridge Jordan, who between parties finds time to sell many a dress. At one time she was mistress of a large and beautiful home with the appropriate number of servants, but after financial reverses went into business in her own home. She stays home faithfully every day until late afternoon to take orders.

Mrs. Cortlandt Parker is a prominent member of Capital society who has her own dress shop, runs her house and three children, and yet finds time to take part in the so-called Washington whirl.

IF A famous silversmith hadn't bought the country home of Mrs. Howard Railey's grandmother, the chances are that Mrs. Railey would never yet have been in business. But when she went up to see how the new tenant, Per Smeed, was getting along, she became so fascinated by the beautiful objects he hammered out of silver that she decided to try to sell some. The wife of the assistant to Grant Mason, of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, Mrs. Railey, is the artist's agent for Washington and also for Manila, having sold many of his things by letter and picture to admiring friends in the Philippine capital.

Washington Residents Stay On at Blue Ridge

Selsenhorst Is Scene Of Bridge Luncheon; Rev. Robeson Is Visitor

As this fall has been lingering in the lap of summer, many of the summer residents from Washington on the Blue Ridge have been loathe to leave. Among those who are staying on to enjoy October, which is the most beautiful month of the year in the mountains, are Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd B. Wilson and Mr. and Mrs. Carl Droop, of Selsenhorst, which is one of the first homes built by another pioneer, Mrs. Sellhausen, mother of Mrs. Droop, over 30 years ago. Mrs. Droop entertained at Selsenhorst, at a bridge luncheon, Friday.

The Rev. J. M. Robeson, former rector of Christ Episcopal Church, Millwood, but now at Mount Verde, Fla., has been the guest the first of the week of Mrs. M. J. Dunlap. Mr. Robeson is now the guest of his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Coleman, at their home in Charlottesville.

Mr. and Mrs. William B. Watkins entertained at a dinner in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard B. Jones at their home, Annefield, Friday evening.

MRS. WALTER ROESLER, who has been the guest of her son, Benjamin Harrison, at his home, Longwood, returned this week to her home at Great Neck, Long Island. Mrs. Roesler's daughter, Miss Gwynn Harrison, who has been spending some time at her mother's home, is expected to return to Longwood next week.

Lieut. Morton Mumma, U. S. N., Mrs. Mumma and their two children, of Annapolis, Md., who have been guests of Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Harris, have returned home. Mr. and Mrs. Mumma while here were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Blackburn Moore, of Winchester; Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Griffing and Mr. and Mrs. Hobson McGehee, of Berryville.

Mrs. C. T. A. McCormick had as her recent guests Mrs. Charles F. McGuire, of Washington, and Mr. and Mrs. Al Shapleigh, of St. Louis and Maryland.

Mr. Henry Weds Alice Manning

At a quiet ceremony last evening Miss Alice P. Manning became the bride of Milton Lyman Henry at the home of her mother, Mrs. George Henry Manning. Mr. Henry is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Milton Henry.

The house was decorated with ferns and gladioli for the ceremony at 7:45 o'clock, at which the Rev. J. Harold Mumper officiated.

Given in marriage by her brother, George H. Manning, jr., the bride wore an eggshell satin frock with a jacket. She wore a wreath of lilies of the valley in her hair and carried a bouquet of white roses.

Mrs. John K. Hedler was matron of honor and only attendant for her sister. Her frock of rose satin also had a jacket. She carried a bouquet of pink roses.

E. Milton Heider was best man.

There was a small reception following the ceremony. Mrs. Manning had selected a black marquisette frock for the occasion.

When the couple left for their wedding trip to New York the bride was wearing a brown costume suit and matching accessories. They will make their home at 605 Ray drive, Silver Spring, Md.

Mr. Henry attended Columbia Technical Institute, in Washington.

Kopplemanns Back From Trip Abroad

Former Representative H. P. Kopplemann, of Connecticut, and Mrs. Kopplemann, have returned to their home in Hartford and plan to visit Washington some time this autumn. After attending the world Zionist congress in Geneva, Mr. and Mrs. Kopplemann traveled in Europe for two months and made a trip to the Holy Land.

They sailed from Le Havre aboard the S. S. Washington, and arrived in New York ten days ago.

Engagement Announced

Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Yager announce the engagement of their daughter, Frances, to Joseph Kratz, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Kratz, of Washington.

Miss Couzens Returns

Miss Betty Couzens, of Pontiac, Mich., daughter of the late Senator Couzens, arrived in Washington Friday morning and is staying at the Mayflower Hotel.

War Relief Work Keeps Quantico Busy

Women to Begin Hospital Sewing Thursday Afternoon

EXCEPT FOR FAREWELL entertaining for the officers of the Fifteenth Regiment and their wives who will leave for Parris Island next week-end, the interest of Quantico hostesses the past week has centered around the Women's War Relief Unit for Red Cross Work.

Mrs. E. P. Moses presided at the opening meeting of the organization held in the Officers' Club Tuesday afternoon. Work on hospital sewing will begin Thursday afternoon at 1 o'clock in the dining room of the Bachelor Officers Quarters, under the direction of Mrs. P. H. Torrey, Mrs. J. B. Pollard, Mrs. A. H. Noble, Mrs. W. T. Clement, Mrs. R. R. Robinson, Mrs. W. T. Brown and Mrs. R. H. Ridgeley, will cut out the garments for Thursday's work. Mrs. L. McC. Little, who was chosen chairman, will bring to the unit the valuable experience she gained as a Red Cross official in the World War.

BRIG. GEN. and Mrs. E. P. Moses were hosts at a dinner for eight given in their quarters Thursday evening as a farewell courtesy to Lieut. Col. and Mrs. R. H. Pepper. The Peppers were "at home" Friday afternoon to officers of Col. Pepper's battalion, Fifteenth Marines, and their wives.

Lieut. Col. and Mrs. L. C. Shepherd entertained with a cocktail party in their quarters Thursday afternoon.

While the officers of the junior and senior classes of the Marine Corps schools are encamped for field exercises near Brentsville, several women are taking advantage of their husbands' absence and making home visits with their families.

MRS. JOHN WHITE, one of the post's most recent brides, has returned to the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. Lee Echelberger, at Dayton, Ohio.

During Capt. William's absence, Mrs. R. H. Williams is with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Tuckerman, at their Edgemoor, Md., home, Tuxeden.

Brig. Gen. and Mrs. Holland Smith moved into their quarters at the post this week. Gen. Smith assumed command of the First Marine Brigade Thursday.

Capt. and Mrs. E. H. Phillips attended the horse show ball at the Shoreham last evening and are spending the week-end in Washington as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Cahill.

Lieut. and Mrs. T. F. Riley have with them for a visit of several weeks, Mrs. Riley's mother, Mrs. S. L. Eddy, of Portland, Oreg.

THE MARRIAGE of Miss Kathleen Wanamaker Cherry, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Cherry, of Orangeburg, S. C., and Charles Marshall, of Charleston and Anderson, S. C., will take place in December, it was announced this week. Miss Cherry has been a frequent visitor at Quantico with her aunts, Mrs. Julian Smith and Mrs. Raphael Griffin.

Benefit Party Arranged for Polish Refugees

South American Women Plan To Visit Capital on Goodwill Tour

People's Mandate Sponsors Trip of Distinguished Group

By Jessie Ash Arndt.

The Post Club Editor.

Emphasizing the desire of the nations of this hemisphere for peace, the People's Mandate Committee to End War is sponsoring a goodwill tour of a party of distinguished South American women in this country. The visitors will arrive in Washington next Sunday, and after being welcomed here, will make a two-month trip, going through the Southwest, swinging back to the North and winding up in New York.

Miss Mabel Vernon, director of the People's Mandate Committee, has announced this as the first in a series of three tours, return visits following the three goodwill trips made by women of the United States to South America.

"These tours have the unqualified approval of the State Department," said Miss Vernon, and are for the purpose of spreading information on inter-American affairs and giving women in this country an opportunity to hear more of the progress and culture of our neighbors to the South."

Two Will Go From Washington

Miss Vernon and Mrs. Thomas Burke, a Chilean by birth and wife of the chief of the division of International Communications of the State Department, will accompany the South American women on their tour.

Members of the delegation will include: Senorita Susana Perez Irigoyen, of Buenos Aires, a prominent young journalist on the staff of "La Nacion;" Senora Rosa Marcos de Ycaza, wife of the Ecuadorean consul-general at San Francisco and daughter of the Ecuadorean minister to Spain; Senora de Paula Fonseca, of Rio de Janiero, daughter of the Ambassador of Brazil; Dr. Carlos Martins.

Also Senora Angela Acuna de Chacon, of San Jose, Costa Rica, who has taken a leading part in organizing the school system of her country; Senorita Mercedes Guerra, of Havana, personal representative for the Mandate chairman for Cuba, Senora Borrero de Lujan; Senora Anita Fernandi de Alvarez-Calderon, of Lima, Peru, chairman of the Committee for Peace and Arbitration of the National Council of Women in Peru, and Senorita Yvonne Gonzalez Rincones, of Caracas, Venezuela, daughter of the former Minister of Education of Venezuela.

Many Affairs Planned Here

A full program of sightseeing and social affairs has been planned for the visitors during their stay in Washington. They will be given an informal reception in the Union Station on their arrival at 5:30 Sunday afternoon, followed by a supper at the home of Miss Mary Winslow.

Monday morning, at 10, they will be received by Secretary of State Cordell Hull, and a luncheon will be given for them at the Carlton Hotel by members of the sponsors' committee, with Mrs. Laurence Duggan as chairman. This will be followed by a drive over the city in the afternoon, tea at the American Association of University Women's clubhouse.

Tuesday they will visit Mount Vernon, attend the weekly luncheon of the Women's National Press Club, visit Government departments and several social welfare projects, have tea with Miss Gertrude L. Crocker as hostess at the Little Tea House, attend an informal reception at the Brazilian Embassy and be entertained at supper at the home of Representative Caroline O'Day.

They will spend Wednesday in Baltimore. Thursday they will return here, to be received by Dr. Leo S. Rowe, director of the Pan American Union, in the morning, visit the universities, have luncheon at the Inter-American Center of George Washington University; be received for tea at the White House by Mrs. Roosevelt, and attend a reception given by the Undersecretary of State and Mrs. Sumner Welles, at Oxon Hill, Md.

Headed by Mrs. Cordell Hull, honorary chairman, the list of sponsors includes: Mrs. Henry A. Wallace, wife of the Secretary of Agriculture; Mrs. Harlan F. Stone, wife of Associate Justice Stone, of the Supreme Court; Miss Mary Anderson, chief of Women's Bureau, Department of Labor; Judge Fay L. Bentley, Juvenile Court; Miss Katherine C. Blackburn, Mrs. Emily Newell Blair.

Prepare to Welcome Good Will Visitors

Club Forms Organization For Girls

The National Women's Club, one of Washington's newest organizations, is preparing to inaugurate a program of civic activity with the establishment of girls' clubs in the Capital. The first is to be located in Georgetown and the women hope to start others in sections where there is need for recreational centers for young girls.

Mrs. Charles P. Keyser, founder and president of the Entre Nous Club is also president of the new society which was started last January. It requires its members to have been recognized for their democratic leadership in other organizations and to have had experience in public service.

Mrs. Ernest William Howard, who is first vice president, is a past president of the Ladies Auxiliary of the Fire Department and also legislative chairman of the D. C. Federation of Women's Clubs. Mrs. Henry Fenno Sawtelle, second vice president, is treasurer of the federation and past president of the Housekeepers' Alliance. Mrs. Raymond J. Brungart, the secretary is associate editor of the International Fire Fighters' magazine; Mrs. M. E. White, treasurer, an officer of the Single Tax Club; Mrs. E. Morgan Pryse, parliamentarian, past president of the Marietta Park Women's Club, and Mrs. Albert Lee Rheinstrom, chairman of membership, is among the first social service workers of the District.

Republican Women To Hear Address By Jessie Sumner

The League of Republican Women will be addressed by Representative Jessie Sumner at its first meeting of the season tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 at the Mayflower Hotel. Representative Sumner, of Illinois, is one of the outstanding Republican women of her State and a prominent social worker.

On Wednesday the league will begin its open house silver teas from 4:30 to 5:30 at the clubhouse. Mrs. Howard LeRoy, second vice president, will receive.

National President Here

Mrs. Rollo K. Packard, national president of the Woman's Auxiliary to the American Medical Association, will address the local auxiliary at its first fall meeting Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock.

D. C. Women in Athletics

Association for Health, Physical Education and Recreation.

This column is sponsored by the District Board of the National Section on Women's Athletics, American Association for Health, Physical Education and Recreation.

By Margaret Davis.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE of Helen Lawrence, instructor in physical education at George Washington University, women students at that institution plan to be beautiful though intelligent this winter.

A workshop for figures is being set up complete with rowing machines, measuring tapes, benches, mats, flat mirrors and stall bars. These facilities will be open to university women from 9 in the morning to 5 in the evening so they may exercise at odd hours convenient to them in addition to attending scheduled classes.

Women may attend scheduled classes in order to have their postural and figure faults analyzed and to learn corrective exercises.

ACCORDING to Miss Lawrence, who will conduct the classes, as much attention will be given to proper sitting and walking postures as to cultivation of proper stance.

Consideration of posture from the standpoint of motion; that is, posture as it occurs in actual life and not just posture in front of a mirror, is very important, she says. And recalling the number of people we have known who could stand up straight when they wanted to, but who seldom did, we are inclined to agree with her.

THE WORKSHOP FOR FIGURES is not just another idea that the gym teachers thought up, the Colonial physical educators assure us. It is the department's answer to numerous requests made over a period of years by upper class students who no longer are enrolled in required gym classes, who want to exercise, and who are interested in getting something out of their exercise.

In addition to affording these earnest young women a share of exercise, we are told that fashion experts will appear at the Workshop to lecture and illustrate the technique of wearing clothes, a technique which has a great deal more to do with posture than most people realize, Miss Lawrence says.

Activities of Women's Organizations Get Under Way With a Bang

CLUB ACTIVITIES are definitely underway for the season. With the advent of October, the year has begun for practically every woman's organization in the city.

A few of the announcements of "first" meetings this week follow:

THE JUNIOR WOMAN'S GUILD of American University will have its opening session Thursday at 8 p. m. in the women's residence hall. After the business meeting Irma Zirik will review several new books.

THE MARIETTA PARK WOMAN'S CLUB starts off its season Tuesday with a meeting at the home of Mrs. W. K. Huntemann, 5732 Georgia avenue.

THE ARLINGTON WOMAN'S CLUB will meet tomorrow afternoon in its clubrooms on Columbia pike. A luncheon will be served at 1 o'clock by the executive committee, with Mrs. S. C. Dinan as chairman. Plans for the year will be outlined at the business meeting, with the president, Mrs. St. John Perrott, in charge.

and Mrs. A. L. Handy, chairman of the garden department, conducting a flower mart for the benefit of the building fund. Members will contribute plants, bulbs and shrubs to be sold.

THERE ARE ALSO D. A. R. chapter meetings, to which a separate article in an other column is devoted. Other activities include the Political Study Club executive board meeting at 11 o'clock tomorrow at the Mayflower Hotel, the meeting of the executive board of the Professional Writers' Club tomorrow night, with Mrs. Nell V. Smith, president, as hostess at dinner at the Y. W. C. A.; the League of Republican Women, having its first meeting at the Mayflower at 2 p. m.; the Woman's Clinic, resuming its meetings tomorrow night; the Columbia Heights Art Club, opening its season Thursday; the new Service Guild of Washington, holding its first board meeting Friday; the first meeting of Langdon Parent-Teacher Association in the school auditorium Thursday night; the League of American Pen Women's tea at the Grafton Wednesday—and so on ad infinitum from now until next July.

Your Shopping Reporter

As listless September drifts into the haze and October comes riding in with a sparkle in her eyes, it's quite natural for us to begin to sit up and take notice—and get renewed interest in life and what goes with it. Why, in Autumn even the foods on our tables reflect the glory of the season as we become more willing to spend a little extra on amusements and "unusualities" that make for pleasure and, of course, good looks. The latter, I'm convinced, after deep study and observation, is more of a question of method than of material. Sorry, girls, but you may not be excused from your weekly visits to the Beauty Shop nor from your "spasmodic sprees" displaying "clothes consciousness."

And now, after all this pleasant preamble, I will begin my column, which I trust, will give you tangible ideas that shall help you carry out the above suggestions.

Rose Barnette Dress Shop

"IT WILL PAY YOU TO GO OUT OF YOUR WAY" . . . to take a "peek-see" at the adorable "wooly" dresses at ROSE BARNETTE'S uptown shop. For the tiny price of 7.95 you may select a frock worth dollars more. Plaids, checks, plain colors and combinations . . . in ALL SIZES. Clever, smart styles you'll cherish! OTHER STREET, SPORT and AFTERNOON DRESSES tagged from 6.95 to 16.95. ALTERATIONS FREE. 5403 GEORGIA AVE. N.W.

NORBUD

"YOUR BEST FOOT FORWARD" . . . in a pair of NORBUD STOCKINGS. Where can you find hosiery as lovely, as transparent, as sheer and AS LONG WEARING as those from THE NORBUD HOSIERY SHOPS for the tiny price of 69c per pair? Stockings that sell elsewhere for 1.00 and 1.35 can be purchased in service or chiffon weight, 2, 3 or 4 thread . . . and in fall's most exquisite, exciting shades. And, remember, they're ALL PERFECT. Sold at ten NORBUD SHOPS, the three downtown locations being 1115 G ST. N.W., 1013 CONN. AVE. and 1329 F ST. N.W.

Livingston Market

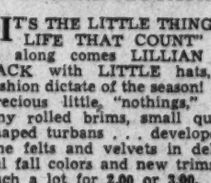
"SHINE ON, SHINE ON HARVEST MOON" . . . for with it comes plump, yellow pumpkins, hard juicy apples, delicious tangy cider and other piquant delights. THE LIVINGSTON MARKET features, for the week, the finest fall foods obtainable. Their fruits and vegetables have never been so crisp, so fresh—and in such abundance. Unusual foods are found in both the Grocery and Meat Sections of this fine market. Call CL. 2374 (they deliver) or go to 5516 CONN. AVE.

Southern Stelos

"A HOLE IN YOUR GLOVE IS WORTH TWO IN YOUR PURSE" . . . or am I a bit mixed? Anyhow, the idea is simply this . . . it may cost you a trifle to have your mittens repaired, but no matter what the cost it's worth it, for fingers poking through gloves are most unsightly. There isn't a shop in Washington that repairs gloves as satisfactorily as SOUTHERN STELOS. They use a machine method that repairs them TO STAY. The price is so small . . . and for cleaning short white gloves they charge but 20c . . . 25c for long ones. Black or brown gloves (any length) refinished and cleaned like new for 35c. Gather your mittens together and "hie" them around to SOUTHERN STELOS, 613 12TH ST. N.W.

Pall Mall

"THE NEWS YOU'VE BEEN WAITING TO HEAR" . . . All you smart Washingtonians gather close around your old auntie shopper for she's got news for yuh! The Gala Opening of Washington's continental rendezvous, THE PALL MALL ROOM at THE HOTEL RALEIGH, will take place Tuesday, October 3, at 8 p. m. Bert Bernath and his "music in the smart manner," plus intimate floor entertainment will delight you no end and Ethel M. Fistere presents the Arthur Murray Dancing Hour each evening during interlude. Dinner dance 3.00 per person (opening night only) and there's NO COVER. The food is incomparable, the atmosphere is delightful and the entertainment is "tops." For reservations, call Mr. Arthur, NA. 3810.



LILLIAN GUSACK

"IT'S THE LITTLE THINGS IN LIFE THAT COUNT" . . . so along comes LILLIAN GUSACK with LITTLE hats, the fashion dictate of the season! Such precious little "nothings," some tiny rolled brims, small queerly shaped turbans . . . developed of fine felts and velvets in delightful fall colors and new trims . . . such a lot for 2.00 or 3.00. LILLIAN GUSACK'S only prices. 5022 CONN. AVE. Open evenings!

The Palais Royal

"IF YOU CAN RESIST THESE" . . . you've more will power than I . . . for I practically went to pieces over the WESTBURY FROCKS the PALAIS ROYAL ARE FEATURING ON THEIR MAIN FLOOR. If you know anything of WESTBURY FROCKS you know how meticulously, how carefully and smartly they are fashioned. Every dress has a 3-inch hem, 1-inch side seams, accurate measurements and fine stitching. They pass the stiffest of examinations. Fashioned of wool, rayon or combinations of the two, they come in all desirable fall colors. Some are made with smart little pique collars—others self-trimmed . . . ALL WONDERFUL BUYS—at 3.95, 6.50 and 7.95. THE PALAIS ROYAL.

Leroy Thayer

"WHEN THE BAND STRIKES UP" . . . a Spanish air, do you have to "play the role" of wallflower? Here's a grand suggestion to overcome that embarrassment. Take Tango and Rumba lessons from the excellent instructors at LEROY THAYER'S, whose private classes of this nature are steadily increasing in popularity. You'll enjoy learning to dance at this studio—the lovely, refined atmosphere, the fine, professional attitude of the teachers makes LEROY THAYER'S an outstanding "School of Dance" . . . a privilege all Washington can enjoy. Phone ME. 4121. 1215 CONN. AVE.

The Beaver Hat Antiques Middleburg, Virginia

"FOR LOVERS OF ANTIQUES" . . . it is well worth your while to take the pleasant drive to MIDDLEBURG, VIRGINIA—for there you will discover the BEAVER HAT, an artistic, spotlessly clean shop offering exquisite articles of exceptional quality at amazing prices. This shop is listed in Odel's Gold Antique Guide and is one of the most unique in this part of the county, 40 miles from Washington on Route 50.

NORMANDY FARM

"YOUR SHOPPING REPORTER" . . . can do you no harm, When she tells you to dine out at NORMANDY FARM. The food, the huge fireplaces really are grand, And Marjory Hendricks is always on hand To welcome you and a chosen few. The number? ROckville 352. Wis. Ave. to 4500 bl., turn left on River Rd., drive 8 mi. to Potomac, Md., turn left on Rockville Falls Rd.

Harlton FUR SHOP

"NOW IS THE TIME" . . . to have your FUR OR CLOTH COAT altered or remodeled. MR. HARITON'S many successful years of experience make him outstanding in perfection of work and smartness of style. You'll be amazed at his reasonable prices. TRY HARITON'S FIRST. NO. 3292. 1617 CONN. AVE.

Emile

"FOR A PLEASANT WAY TO REDUCE" . . . EMILE offers a THIRTY OR SIXTY DAY CLASS MEMBERSHIP for only 15.00 or 25.00. This entitles you to cabinet or steam baths, ring rollers, bicycles, vibratory belts and class exercise. With the aid of such fine mechanical devices, you can enjoy SPOT REDUCING, so that you may concentrate on those very special places where weight lurks the heaviest. Body massage and colonic irrigations by graduate nurses, 3.00 each. Phone ME. 6495 or DI. 3616. 1221 CONN. AVE.

Lena Gerber

"THEY'RE THE TALK O' THE TOWN" . . . these girls at LENA GERBER'S who make and remodel hats with such skill, originality and style. Right now they are making exquisite fur and fur-trimmed hats to match coats . . . and LENA GERBER has a host of smart "ready-made" model hats—that are the "pick of the style shows"—for display and sale. Hurry to 1603 CONN. AVE.

Between you and me and the raindrops . . . there are some swell sales in certain dress shops . . . of course, you know that special attention is given to mail orders and out-of-town inquiries—whether they are about dresses, hats, shoes, gloves, gadgets or permanents— and don't forget the man who pays the bills—just charge up something special for him some time.

Miss Rust Wed At Leesburg To Mr. Williams

Rev. and Mrs. Lee Visit Welbourns This Week

Leesburg, Va., Sept. 30.—The highlight of social entertainment here this week was the large reception which Mr. and Mrs. David N. Rust gave at their home, Rockridge, following the marriage of their daughter, Miss Caroline Caverly Rust, to Edward McCormick Williams, of Berryville, on Wednesday evening. Electric lights flooded the lawn where the large crowds assembled after they passed the receiving line in the drawing room. Five hundred guests from Berryville, Washington, Alexandria, Baltimore and Leesburg were present. The Rusts also entertained at a buffet supper on Tuesday evening at their Rockridge home.

The Rev. and Mrs. Harry B. Lee, of Towson, Md., are guests this week of the Rev. and Mrs. J. Armistead Welbourn and were present for the Williams-Rust wedding. House guests of the Rusts this week were Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Phillips, of Washington; Miss Mary Lloyd, of Alexandria, and Miss Crimola Waite, of Culpeper.

Senorita Paredes To Become Bride On October 5

Senorita Lolitin Paredes, daughter of Senor and Senora Antonio Paredes of Panama City, has selected Thursday, October 5, as the date of her wedding to Augusto Boyd, son of the Minister of Panama and Senora de Boyd. The legation here is awaiting further details about the ceremony.

The Minister and his wife, who have been in Panama for several weeks, will stay over for the wedding. The young couple, who have known each other since childhood, will come to Washington shortly after their marriage.

Takoma Park Greets Visitors As Many Residents Take Trips

Florida and New England Attract A Number of Families; Entertaining Confined Largely to the Clubs

EARLY AUTUMN is taking many Takoma Park families on trips from northern New England to Florida while a steady stream of visitors arrived throughout the week. Entertaining was principally confined to club leaders honoring their department heads at luncheons and first meetings of the season.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy L. Seaman of Baltimore avenue left yesterday for a motor trip to New York, New England, the Great Lakes and Chicago. They will be away for several weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry I. Houston, of Park avenue, have left on their annual vacation to Shelburne, N. H., where they will be until the middle of November. Mr. Houston expects to do some hunting while in the North.

Mr. and Mrs. Austin B. Jeffries will return the latter part of the week to their home on Sycamore avenue from a two weeks' motor trip through the South.

The Misses Betty and Mary Gerhold, twin sisters of Mrs. Albert F. Lingle, of Grant avenue, will leave a week from tomorrow, October 9, for a vacation in Miami, Fla.

MAJ. CHARLES JOHNSON, U. S. A., former councilman of Takoma Park, and Mrs. Johnson, of Kansas City, Mo., are guests of Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Wilson, of Fifth street, having seen the World's Fair in New York last week-end with the Wilsons, who joined them. Maj. and Mrs. Johnson will be house guests of Mrs. Frank Nickols, of Holt place, for this week. Several parties are being planned for the couple.

Miss Mary Treat and her sister, Mrs. Mina Klitz, with Mrs. Mary Palmer, of Lakewood, Ohio, are the guests of Mrs. Palmer's sister, Miss Jessie Masters, of Columbia avenue, who has just returned from a summer's stay in Maine and Cape Cod to open her studio in Washington Wednesday.

Miss Dorothy McKinstry, of San Francisco, Calif., arrived Thursday to spend the fall and winter with Mrs. Horace W. Whittaker at her home on First street.

Mrs. C. Leavenworth Elliott and daughter, Miss Martha Elliott, of New York, came down yesterday from their summer home in New Market, Vt., to stay with Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Ramsdell until next spring, having given up their New York apartment. Mrs. Elliott spends every winter here, but it is Miss Elliott's first stay in Washington for a season.

ANNOUNCEMENT is made by Mr. and Mrs. Charles William Hicks, of Holly avenue, of the birth of a daughter, Tuesday at the Washington Santitarium. Mrs. Hicks and the baby will join Mr. Hicks in Buenos Aires in a month to make their home.

Mr. and Mrs. Mason L. Graham, are being congratuated on the birth of a son, Donald Mason, born September 23 at Providence Hospital. Mrs. Graham is the former Miss Doris Potter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Potter, of Sherman avenue.

Mr. and Mrs. B. H. Colbert, of Park avenue, are building a home in Woodside Park, Md., but will not leave the community until the spring.

Miss Fister Wed In Arlington

The marriage of Miss Doris Fister, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Fister, of Plano, Ill., and Charles Strickler took place yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock at the home of the bride's brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Russell G. Fister, in Arlington, Va. Mr. Strickler is the son of Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Strickler, of Arlington.

Before a background of autumn flowers the Rev. K. K. Hadaway officiated at the ceremony. The bride was given in marriage by her brother.

The bride wore a Degas rose satin gown with short sleeves, deep decollete and a slight train. Her hat was of matching net and satin and she carried a bouquet of white roses.

Wearing a polka purple faille frock, Miss Mary Louise Inbody served as maid of honor. She carried a bouquet of mixed flowers.

Lieut. Richard Strickler was best man for his brother.

When the couple left for their honeymoon the bride wore a moss green traveling ensemble with brown accessories.

CANUTE WATER is more important than Rouge or Lipstick . . . IF you have Gray Hair

If you have gray hair, simply wet it with Canute Water and allow to dry. A few applications, (all in one day, if desired) completely re-colors it . . . similar to its former natural shade. Attention only once a month will keep it that way.

Curl your hair or get a permanent, if you wish. There's no interference. Neither will sunshine, salt-water or shampooing disturb the color. Your hair remains clean and natural to the touch and looks natural in any light.

Safe!
No Skin Test Needed

Canute Water is pure, safe, colorless and crystal-clear. It has a remarkable record of 25 years without injury to a single person. It was also tested and proven perfectly harmless by a Noted Scientist in one of America's Greatest Universities.

No Other Product Can Make All These Claims

Is it any wonder that we sell more Canute Water than all other hair coloring preparations combined?

Furniture Styles Reflect Sobered World, Swing to Sturdy Eighteenth Century Lines

'Arty' Types Give Way To Practical Suites

Heavy Demand for Good Copies of Original English Designs Lowers Prices; Lighter Weight Geared to Modern Convenience

By Marshall Adams
The Post Fashion Editor.

A STATE of international unrest has its affect upon furniture fashions just as it has on women's tastes in clothes.

Marshall Adams

Before the World War furniture peculiarities were introduced to homes all over the country. That was the "Mission" period which reflected the hard times and quite different was it from the former fluttering styles of the care-free Victorian era. Contemporaries dubbed that crude oak furniture "Elbert Hubbards" after the dictates of the war-conscious head of the house of "Roycrofters." The masculine tailleurs women wore to work were matched only by the severe furnishings they came home to at night.

A similar psychology enters into this year's furniture tastes. The differance is that now conservatism has replaced crudeness of taste. Within the last year a noticeable preference has been shown for sturdy eighteenth-century styles in contrast to the more piquant French Provincial or chaste "Swedish Modern" which homemakers were addicted to a year or so ago. War news seems to have sobered the buying habits of women so that "arty" or period furniture does not attract as does that of the traditional English period. Moreover, comfort for husband and family is the requisite these days.

Has Beauty Appeal

Aside from his subtle psychology which is making women today buy eighteenth century furniture, the real beauty and timeliness of this period appeals to persons of all cultures. Local furniture experts give three other reasons for the renaissance of the fine craftsmanship of the 1700s. Here they are:

FIRST, eighteenth century styles are less expensive than ever before. While these pieces were once considered the heritage of fine families alone or the acquisition of the wealthy, furniture factories are now making good copies of original English pieces at costs which match those of the better "French walnuts" or Early American pieces. The volume of requests for eighteenth century copies is the reason prices are normal for the first time since Sheraton or Heppelwhite first carved their handsome classic curves.

More Functional Designs

SECOND, they have gone modern—the Duncan Phyfes, the Sheratons, the Chippendales and the rest of those sturdy schools of designs. While original balance and proportion of line have been faithfully adhered to, the modern copies are more practical for hectic every-day existence. Virginia sofas and Sheraton love seats for instance have been thinned at the back, retaining the original depth of seat but making for a lighter weight article for small apartments or homes. Lined silver or linen compartments in Chippendale sideboards now reside where only smooth patina once appeared. Traditional beauty is now geared to twentieth century convenience.

THIRD, twentieth century furniture suits this countryside. Washington with its nearby F. F. V., its old Alexandria homes, its historic Mt. Vernon and Warrenton brands of culture, is the perfect setting for the dignity and sturdiness of this style. Chippendale, for instance, is the most popular furniture used in this vicinity and within the last year has outsold all other types in authentic copies. The dinners and parties taking place in private homes, rather than in night clubs (as is the opposite in other metropolitan areas) demand a comfortable background of graceful living.

New Fall Complexions

If your home is already well springled with eighteen century originals or their offspring, there are many stimulating ways of giving new life to these autumn rooms. A tall secretary, chest of drawers or highboy can produce a new vertical look to rooms which formerly wore a placid summertime appearance of horizontal lines. A decorative art carpet in the same period design as that of your furniture can be purchased for almost a song now so that the spirit of your entire room is in key. A classic wedgwood pattern in blue and beige has recently been achieved in a moderately priced carpeting for Sheraton rooms.

With less money to spend but a desire this fall to alter the complexion of a room yet keep it authentic in period, the purchase of new lamps is a delightful enterprise, especially during National Furniture Week which started yesterday and lasts through October 7. At this time furniture and furnishing prices are enticingly low. English porcelains in Royal Dolton or Staffordshire pattern or Achilles Bloch's fine French porcelain base lamps are appropriate period styles for eighteenth century rooms.

ABOVE is eighteenth century furniture gone functional—for the first time. The Dexbury table to the right, pure Sheraton in design, has a solid mahogany top. It is designed to be an effective console or sofa table or a practical dining table when pulled out in this gracious room. The complimentary chest in the background is not only decorative, but as a utility buffet, for the drawers are velvet lined for silver and the shelves have convenient storage space for china, etc.

AT RIGHT the Dexbury table, with one leaf inserted, is opened to serve six dinner guests. The buffet is transformed for service. Although separate dining rooms are returning to the hostess' favor after being considered "old fashioned" for a couple of years, a convertible living-dining room like this should answer the needs of Government or private business employes in Washington who have moderate budgets and apartment space to work with.

Mary Haworth's Mail

Deeply in Love With Woman-Shy Older Man, Girl Asks How to Be Winning Without Being Bold

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: For three years, I have been deeply in love with a man who is a good many years my senior. We share interests of a kind that few of our acquaintances share and this contributes to a close mutual understanding. And while I am in my twenties, I have always been happiest with older people and have never been able to make friends easily with boys my own age.

I know that I love this man with all my heart, but in order to make him realize my love, I shall have to make a few advances. The only obstacle to complete understanding between us is his shyness; as he is shy with all women. Hence, my problem is this: Would it be appropriate for me to send him a greeting at Christmas, when I shall be far away from him?—as I always go south with the family in winter.

Of course, I know this is a common practice among modern young people. But I wonder if he, being older, would consider it a brazen overture on the part of an adventurous girl? Or would he be pleased with it as a token of affection? Please give me your advice—and remember that it may mean the continuance or the extinction of a happiness that I long for, and that I am sure he will want, when he understands how I feel.

MARYLAND.

Hair-Splitting Attitude Regarding Courtesies

DEAR MARYLAND: Persons who send any Christmas cards at all usually send them to everybody on their calling list. Whatever sentimental significance underlies the traditional greeting is generally understood to have been chiefly inspired by the season itself rather than by the person receiving the remembrance.

If one is to bring a hair-splitting attitude to the question posed here, then I should say that it would be downright uncivil not to send the man a cordial message at Christmas. It would imply that you had forgotten his existence during a season traditionally dedicated to remembering friends. Unless he is the deadliest stuffed shirt the world ever produced, he simply could not think of your courteous gesture as a "brazen overture."

Since he is so inordinately woman-shy, you probably will have to do much more than send him a Christmas card if you hope to get under his guard. When you are settled for the winter down South, why don't you write to him regularly? Correspondence between the sexes is a commonplace occurrence among civilized persons—particularly among the unmarried—and has been for centuries. Letter writing can be both an art and a form of education when intelligently handled—as witness the publishers' continual output of "collected letters" of well-known men and women. One is being coy and provincial who supposes that an exchange of letters is only and always a camouflaged form of courtship.

M. H.

Why Is She Bored Everywhere She Goes?

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: I am appealing to you in the hope that you may be able to suggest the solution of my problem. I cannot go any place without getting bored almost immediately after arriving. This happens at church affairs, outings, parties, everywhere.

Sometimes I think the reason may be that I work as secretary in an office where I meet many people who tell me their troubles, so that when I get off with other people outside the office, I feel like a person apart; as though I should go off by myself. And yet, when I am away from the office, I am never happy until I am back at work. I can't shake myself free from this feeling that overtakes me. Your help will be appreciated and I shall look forward to your answer. Very truly yours,

BORED.

The Causes and Cure Of 'Holiday Neurosis'

DEAR BORED: It appears to me that you are suffering from what Dr. W. Beran Wolfe has called the "holiday neurosis," which he says is caused by "failure to develop accessory activities and social interests which make occasional recesses from the business of making a living interesting and meaningful." He lists irritability, nervousness, the blues, depression and vague anxiety as the usual symptoms of this emotional ailment.

Dr. Wolfe warns emphatically, "If holidays or vacations bore you . . . take stock of your situation and begin to broaden the scope of your interest in men and things." Holiday neurosis, he tells us, may actually develop into mental illness, if the sufferer continues to nurse his ingrowing disposition. Dr. Wolfe's views are told in his book, "How to Be Happy Though Human," which you ought to read, since it points the way to health and happiness for all incipiently ailing personalities. The book is published by Farrar & Rinehart.

M. H.

Miss Haworth will be glad to help you in solving your problems. Write her in care of The Post Woman's Page.

A Woman's New York

By Alice Hughes.

New York, Sept. 30.

I'VE BEEN VISITING and chatting with one of Hollywood's nicest women, one whom I saw knitting on a set out there less than three months ago. At present she's here on radio business between films, and meeting old friends of the theater. In family life she's Mrs. John E. Woodall, but for 20 years you've known her in the movies as ZaSu Pitts.

Her present husband, a Los Angeles businessman, has never even been in a film studio, and Zasu says maybe that's why they're so happy. At any rate, they are. She's devoted to her children, too—has a daughter, 17, by a previous marriage, and an adopted son of the same age. To the great distress of press agents, she'll talk about them for a long time, instead of plugging her latest movie for the benefit of the press—and the movie.

At present, however, she is excited about her last film assignment—a real dramatic role in "Nurse Edith Cavell," the picture about the heroic English martyr of the first World War. For nearly 15 years she's been waving those famous hands in pathetic comedy roles—but it wasn't always so.

I remember how she was cast as the bereaved mother in "All Quiet on the Western Front"—but the silly audience laughed, knowing Zasu only as a comedienne. The scenes were finally remade, with the late Beryl Mercer in the role.

Even so, Hollywood's wiser men have always known that ZaSu Pitts was a dramatic actress of enormous ability. Old time film fans will remember her great performance in Eric von Stroheim's production of "Greed," made from Frank Norris' "McTeague." At any rate, she's happy right now, with her family and her success through two decades, and because she's doing drama again in "Nurse Edith Cavell."

GIRL ABOUT TOWN—Early fall here proceeds on schedule. Coney Island had its big fire for the year, and former Gov. Al Smith sang a verse of "The Bowery" at the Park Department's song festival for barber-shop quartets, and Clare Boothe, of "The Women" fame, has a new show ready for the boards. This one is called "Margin for Errors" and, just to be different, has only one woman in the troupe. This part will be played by Elspeth Eric, a mighty pretty name, too.

My heart bled for the poor passengers who got off the Washington the other day, reporting that they had slept in the ship's swimming pool in order to get back to their native land. Alas, the horrors of war!

I STILL hear that Diana Barrymore, daughter of the one-time great trouper, will play the leading girl role when "Outward Bound" goes on tour. Laurette Taylor and Florence Reed, the two grand oldsters, will be starred. If this wondrous play comes anywhere near you, for heaven's sake don't miss it, for it is one of the best of our era.

One of my pet cooking columns is headlined thus—"Quick cinnamon buns roll a man out of bed." Pulling off the covers with a jerk often works, too.

London Doctor Once Tested 150 Patients In 195 Minutes

By Logan Clendening, M. D.

I have been reading an interesting account by Dr. Walter R. Bett of reminiscences of the great London hospital of St. Bartholomew's. With all the complaints that we hear about the medical profession and dispensary practice today, it is illuminating to compare them with the happenings in the dispensary of St. Bartholomew's as short a time ago as 1863, when the resident apothecary was in charge of what may be described as the wholesale treatment of patients.

When all the patients who applied for treatment in the morning had been gathered together in one room, the apothecary would enter and ask all those who complained of a cough to stand up, whereupon he gave them a cough medicine. He then asked all those who had the bellyache to stand up, and he gave them some kind of house physic for that.

The nurses were of the kind of Sarah Gamp, and on account of their overweight, heavy facial features and waddling gait, were sarcastically referred to as "fairies."

1,000 Patients

In 1877 a certain Dr. Robert Bridges was appointed to the post of casualty physician. He made a report a little later in which he pointed out certain abuses. In three months he had seen 7,735 patients and the average time spent on each was 1.28 minutes.

"With the lowest estimate of female garrulity," he wrote, "one may recognize the grandeur of the feat accomplished in giving separate audience to the troubles of 150 women in three hours and a quarter." And he remarked that most of their troubles were brought on by indiscretion, for which the cure would be discretion. Most of them preferred Epcom salts.

What Every Woman Needs Revealed by Producer

Graceful Walk, Poise, Low-Pitched Voice Among Essentials

By Carolyn Abbott.

BIG, LITTLE, FAT, scrawny, tall, short—voluptuous blondes, coy redheads and sophisticated bruenettes recently milled around the Goodacre Theater in New York City. Word had winged its way to the four corners of the metropolis that Ned Jakobs, Broadway producer, was seeking talent for a new musicall comedy. Hundreds of pulchritudinous women of all ages came with expectant, hopeful glints in their eyes. That day there was enough beauty in one spot to dazzle and befuddle any man.

Melodious-voiced Ned surveyed the horde of chic women with a calm detachment. One by one he interviewed each applicant for a part in his new play, "Hello Houseboat," which is taken from "The Houseboat on the Styx" and which is to open in November.

Jakobs' keen Dutch eyes followed every movement and mannerism of the woman to whom he was talking at the moment. With so much comeliness in the offing, what would be his final basis of selection? With the rapidity of a German firing squad, he rejected one and accepted the other. I looked at him quizzically. "A good figure but she doesn't know how to walk properly," he explained. By that time the luscious blonde was out of the room.

Must Walk Gracefully

"No woman is truly beautiful," said Jakobs, "unless she knows how to walk. Her walk must convey gracefulness. It must be rhythmical and it must give the impression of unified movement. The mechanics of walking correctly can be learned at any age, but if a woman is foo old, in a moment of tension and excitement, she will revert to her natural gait. Therefore, to move beautifully either across the stage or a drawing room, a woman must have perfected the technique of perfect balance at an early age.

At that moment, a trim, slender, black-haired girl with a grand duchess manner sauntered into the room. Her thin figure was the fashion sketcher's ideal and her facial features were almost classic in regularity. Surely, she would be taken. But she was quickly sent on her way.

"Lacks curves," commented the producer. "Well-rounded curves are far more fascinating to an audience than a lot of angular bones. The day of slim reeds has passed. Only the very feminine woman has tremendous appeal either on stage or off. Any woman would do well to cultivate sweetness, softness and tenderness, for these are the real womanly qualities. And incidentally, "these are the qualities that attract men in private life as well as from the stage."

This discourse was interrupted by the grand entrance of a very curvy, dynamic-looking Titian type. As for physical beauty apparently nothing was lacking. Much to my amazement she, too, was rejected.

No Personality

"Beautiful, yes," said Ned, "but absolutely no personality. That inner something is lacking. Certainly if there is no personality offstage there won't be any on the stage."

"What is the difference between a stage personality and a natural personality?" I asked.

"A stage personality is really the natural offstage personality projected," Jakobs replied. "The two are inseparable—that is, the inherent essence is the same. For example, a woman whose personality is negative off the stage will not register a positive personality before the footlights. But if she has the potentialities of an arresting personality that is natural it may be trained for large audiences."

One by one the applicants passed before the producer. A few were taken, but the majority were turned down. Ned had a reason for each rejection.

Natural Personaylty Also Vital Factor, Says Jakobs

About one he remarked, "On the surface she's pretty, but she's too artificial-looking. And no doubt she's hard. Don't ever fool yourself that this hard manner doesn't detract from her attractiveness. It makes a woman seem shopworn. That manner is fatal to any woman who seeks masculine approval."

Another Hollywood Legend Crumbles

The Great Muni Isn't as Mysterious As Filmdom Would Let You Think, Says Mrs. Paul Muni, Who Should Know What She's Talking About

By Lucie Neville.

Hollywood.

Paul Muni is almost a legendary figure while he is very much alive. Hollywood talks about him as if he were scarcely human. His yearly film is royally referred to as "the Muni picture," whatever its title. In all billings he must be dignified by the prefix "Mister." Visitors on the often-closed set get the general impression of "Hush! The master is concentrating."

Hollywood says the star gives almost no interviews, that his wife really directs him, that he is a recluse. Favorite story, real basis for all the other legends, is that he becomes so completely absorbed in a character that he genuinely believes he is that person.

Actually, nobody knows much about him except his wife, Bella, who has been married to him 18 years. And she knows plenty. Moreover, she isn't afraid to discuss him because she isn't afraid of Muni himself. But until now, nobody had asked her to talk.

When she came on the set for an afternoon interview, her first question was "Have you seen Muni?" The only indication that he was there was a faint fiddling of "Humoresque" coming from the star's dressing room. Brought by a call boy, her husband emerged from seclusion, gave her a devoted kiss and said, "Darling, there's a woman here with some clothes to show you. She has been waiting since 11 o'clock. Where have you been?"

"To the hairdresser," said Mrs. Muni. "And she'll just have to wait some more. I have an interview. And besides, I told her..."

"But darling!" Muni shouted. "You can't keep her waiting! She's not a dog!"

'Muni' No Affectation

"I told her to come late in the afternoon and it's only 2 o'clock now. If she wants to come early, that's..." His wife looked at the bristling star with a speculative woodshed gleam in her eye, picked up her purse and said gently, "Will you excuse me? ... Where is she, Muni?"

Five minutes later she came back, lit a cigaret, and said with satisfaction, "Well, I bought a pair of pajamas. I didn't want anything that expensive. I wanted some pajamas. It's all Muni's fault and he can pay for them—teach him a good lesson.

"That isn't affectation, calling him 'Muni,'" she explained. "That's his real first name, you know—Muni Weisenfreud. It's amusing to hear people who want to give the impression they are very close friends call his 'Paul.'"

It's an advantage, she believes, to have a husband who thinks everything out loud—anger, enthusiasm, worries. "When I reach the point where any more argument is useless, I just shut up," Mrs. Muni said. "And that's when Muni starts walking around the house shouting to himself—'Now I wonder just what is my status in this house. Is she on speaking terms with me or not, What should I do?'

"There aren't any tantrums. He's—shall we say, difficult?—but never unreasonable." This saying everything he thinks would have got him into trouble much oftener if it weren't for a diplomatic wife. After blowing off to a stranger, it's Muni who will demand irritably, "Now, what made me say that? I should have known better."

And her invariable suggestion is, "Let's take a little walk—I think you need some air." They always return with the actor thoughtful and thoroughly cooled down.

"It sounds trite, but Muni's shy and uncomfortable with strangers," his wife said. "It's just a myth that he doesn't like people. He doesn't like a crowd and when we have a really big party there are eight people in the house, but he's no recluse—he's a fight fan and goes to concerts whenever he can. But until he knows a person he may be silent or shortspoken, though he never is purposely unkind.

"He doesn't like to give interviews on the set because he's busy and doesn't want to lose his concentration on his character. Between pictures we're traveling or preparing for another film. He always promises he'll take a real vacation, but his mind always is on the next picture. At that, it's a liberal education, doing research with Muni. I've learned about English architecture, Chinese philosophy, French medical history — something different every time.

"One legend that really is true is about my leaving the set when he's playing a love scene. But it isn't from jealousy or envy, or even because I may embarrass him. It's just to make it easier for the other woman. Any actress dislikes being made love to when the movie-lover's wife is watching.

Waited Seven Years

"But I am on the set every day, though not all the time. That's where the story started that I direct him. They say I have final okay on his work, that if I shake my head after a scene he plays it until I nod. Another disappointing myth. But we do have certain signals, like any husband and wife, and when he sees I haven't liked a scene he comes over and says, 'What's wrong with you?' Then we argue and sometimes he agrees with me."

An actress in New York's Yiddish theaters before and after her marriage, Bella Finkel's last stage appearance was opposite Muni when he starred in "Four Walls." She may play in a forthcoming Warner Brothers production, "Two Sons." With such a background, she is useful to her husband not only as a critic but as a script reader and rehearsal cast of one.

"He has made only 13 pictures in 11 years," she said. "This winter he's going back to the stage in Maxwell Anderson's 'Key Largo.' He waited seven years to find the play he wanted.

"He starts work with a dictaphone when he's learning his lines. Then when he begins developing the characterization, he uses a recording machine so that he can play back and study his delivery. Finally, when he wants a personal contact, I'm called in to cue him. [illegible] play other roles. His [illegible] is endless. When I drop, he says, 'Just 15 more times for this scene.'"

Good-Looking, Slim

The story they selected for Muni's current pictures at Warner Brothers is the somber "We Are Not Alone"—for once not a title role—James Hilton's tale of a kindly, absent-minded English doctor destroyed by the gossip and hysteria of a spy-suspicious small town. It appealed to the actor because it gives him a change from biographies and epics. After the gray-bearded Pasteur, the queued Wang Lung and the wooden-faced Juarez, fans scarcely can recognize the 41-year-old star out of character.

In real life he's a good-looking fellow, not very tall but slim and hard-muscled. His black eyes are inquisitive. A thick little mustache is reddish, as often is found with very black hair such as Muni's wiry thatch. He doesn't think he is good-looking, his wife said, he always is pointing out imaginary defects—a forehead too low, eyes that are too small, "altogether not an actor type at all." And then she has to kid him out of his self-abasement.

No wiles or jokes, however, can distract his mind from his work. "His absorption of a character is mostly myth," Mrs. Muni said. "We do talk shop endlessly and at home he will retain some mannerism of the character. Now, as the doctor, he retains a slight stoop, a little shuffle. But he didn't talk Chinese in his sleep during 'The Good Earth,' as Hollywood says.

No Personality, No Actor

"Once he gets a story, everything else stops. I might as well take the veil socially."

New York always will be home to the Munis. Their introduction to Hollywood didn't encourage them to like it. Brought out from such Broadway sucesses as "Counselor at Law," the actor's film debut was during the hectic days of early sound.

"I'll never forget that first picture," Mrs. Muni said. "It was 'The Valiant' at Fox. About a week after it had been shooting, William Fox—he's retired now—came into the projection room to see the rushes and said, 'My God! Who's that?' They told him it was the new actor from the New York stage.

"'Well, cut the script—don't make a big picture of it,' Mr. Fox said. 'He'll never make an actor. He hasn't got any personality.'"

Serious Roles for Lombard—But Comedy Between Set Calls

By Vern Haugland.

Hollywood, Sept. 30 (AP).—Moviedom's dizzy dame has turned into a demurely dutiful farm wife, but Carole Lombard still has that old twinkle in her eye. Screwball sensation of the "My Man Godfrey" comedy cycle, now appearing in serious roles, she remains a wag at heart.

The other day, for example, in the midst of the heat wave she ordered up a 100-pound cake of ice and sat on it between set calls. When she was working she turned it over to extras to "keep it warm" for her.

Clark Doing Well

Carole, still receiving compliments for her serious work in her two most recent pictures, "Made for Each Other" and "In Name Only," currently is playing a starkly dramatic role with Brian Aherne in "Vigil in the Night."

Carole, in case you didn't know, for some six months now has been the wife of Clark Gable. They live on a ranch miles from the studio, drive to work together—to separate studios—every day, and are very happy.

Clark spends his leisure hours pitching hay or puttering around the barn. Carole, turned domestic, busies herself about the farmhouse, but occasionally helps her husband milk a cow or rustle up an egg. Recently they went on a motor tour, stopping at plain tourist cabins in a most unmoviefied manner and attracting no attention whatever. Six years ago they played in a picture together—"No Man of Her Own"—but Carole says they wouldn't do it again unless they got just the right story.

"No one," she asserts, "wants to see Mr. Gable playing opposite Mrs. Gable."

Clark is doing quite well in the cinema, thank you, says Carole. She just saw him in a sneak preview of "Gone With the Wind," and she says the picture is terrific.

"You mean Gable is terrific?" she was asked.

"I mean the picture is terrific," she said, firmly. Far be it from Carole to boast, even about Clark.

Maybe they'll be saying "terrific" about Carole one of these days in "Vigil in the Night." From a new novel by A. J. Cronin, it paints England's nursing profession in the same uncompromising colors "The Citadel" did for British medicine.

A nurse in the picture, Carole wears the unromantic uniforms of the profession, complete with cotton stockings, and emotes within a severe hairdo. It's realism, that's what.

Typical is a scene in the bare dormitory room, with iron bedsteads, which Carole occupies with Roommate Brenda Forbes. A supervisor drops in and Brenda, who has been sneaking a smoke, pops the lighted cigarette into her mouth.

"Brenda's done that 20 times in rehearsals," marvels Carole, "and hasn't burned her mouth once."

Carole abandoned haywire comedy, but not for long, not by design and not for fun. She didn't particularly choose the roles in her three serious pictures, she says—"they just came my way and looked like they had guts."

She has no especial preference for drama—"if it's a good part in a good story, that's all that counts"—and she regards comedy as being more difficult than heavier roles.

"In a straight role you react as you would react in life—in comedy you have to do the unexpected," she explains.

Thoroughly Democratic

Carole has no plans for her next picture, but would like to do a drawing-room comedy—as a clothes horse.

"Haven't had any decent clothes in my recent pictures," she complains.

"In 'Vigil' all I get, aside from the nurse's uniform, are two ordinary suits.

"I have a hankering to wear some gorgeous clothes. My next picture must have a wardrobe."

Like her husband, Carole is thoroughly democratic. No retiring, between shots, to the dressing room for her. On the set her dressing table is right by the sound stage entrance, where everyone who enters must pass. Extras and visitors alike stand and gawk, watching the make-up expert gild the Lombard lily.

"Carole likes to be where she can see what goes on," explained one worker.

"She just doesn't want to miss anything."

FAMED as America's No. 1, top-flight de luxe party giver, the fabulous Alfred Barton, of the Miami Beach's equally celebrated Surf Club, is waltzing up a minor gala hereabouts just to show the peasantry how they do things in Florida. Its component parts include an entire trainload of Florida palm trees, George Ade, a railroad tank car filled with live pompano and stone crabs, William K. Vanderbilt, an entire floor at the Waldorf and 200 barrels of genuine Biscayne Bay sand and an orange grove. All these are to be scrambled together at the Waldorf this Thursday evening for the annual Northern dinner of a posse of drolls known as the Committee of 100, of Miami, a chowder and marching society that actually includes some 400 members, all of whom are of practically staggering opulence and accustomed to nothing but the Alfred I. Barton best, which is superlative indeed.

Mr. Barton, who is official flinger of social stampedes in Florida and whose notions of a modest little supper party would interest a Petronius, has always arranged the Committee of 100's dinners for them in Florida, and a little item like moving a substantial part of Florida to Park avenue doesn't make him bat an eye. It's in his mind to erect an entire Biscayne Bay villa at one end of the Waldorf ballroom and he and Lucius Boomer have been as happy as larks all week dreaming up a whole new ceiling of blue metaline, festooned with pompoms to represent stars, and a segment of littoral complete with authentic sand, an orange grove and a whole thicket of Florida palm trees 30 feet high. Their transport, along with the tank car of live sea food, presented a pretty problem to the Seaboard Air Line, but with Harvey Firestone, Gar Wood, Frank Gannett, Fred F. Fisher, Sebastian Kresge, Charles K. Kettering, Earl Sams and Dr. John Oliver La Gorce footing the bill this was a minor consideration. The menu for dinner includes Key West turtle, Gulf pompano, avocados, stone crabs, cocoanuts and no end of Florida flora and fauna whose service and consumptions, along with a proper wine list in the Ziegfeld setting which Mr. Barton has evolved, will make every one feel he's right back in Miami and want to go to the Ha Ha Club after it's all over.

Mr. Barton has not come by his prestige as the country's ranking party giver without years of effort to amuse the Miami Beach plutocrats. Never one to do things by halves, he has transformed the Surf Club, on occasion, into a replica of the Indianapolis Speedway, a trailer camp and the Acropolis of Athens. His major pageant last winter was set in an Indian midst with all the waiters and footmen with bath towels around their heads and Max Factor No. 37 all over, and not one, but three complete Taj Mahals erected around the various swimming pools and ballrooms on the premises. He is also the inventor of a powerful toddy based on applejack that is served at the Surf Club in a whole cocoanut. When you've finished your drink the waiter smashes the cocoanut on the floor just to show that you get a new one each time. This particular item is not on the menu for the Committee of 100.

That wicked Dwight Fiske man, "inimitable" purveyor of bawdy chanties for the ultra-knowing, takes a good portion of the New York scene with him wherever he goes. He once was retained, for a staggering fee, to sing at a party flung by Joseph Pulitzer in St. Louis and it was reported that the only aspects of Manhattan missing were Longacre Square and Lindy's. At the moment Fiske is smashing up a nightly piano at the Colony, Chicago's hottest sin spot, and life around the premises, as well as at Ernie Byfield's Pump Room at the Ambassador East, the Buttery at the Ambassador West and a number of other places favored with the master's daily and uproarious presence, is just a segment of the dementia that customarily obtains in East Fifty-eighth street when he is on tap at the Savoy Plaza. Life is never quiet when the Great Man is performing, and seldom any too respectable, with the result that he is more in demand for cocktail routs and other gin hoistings than anybody this side of Gene Fowler. When he is not pounding the stuffings out of the Steinway at the Colony, Dwight is presiding at his special table, designated by a gold mounted photograph of himself in its center in the Pump Room. Ernie Byfield has missed no known or dreamed of chi-chi in the conduct of the restaurant and the presence of Fiske, surrounded by clouds of flunkies and opening wine by the Belshazzar at high noon, in no way abates its generally florid magnificence.

The Pump Room specializes in court liveries for the waiters, in flaming souffles, a house drink known as "The Bath Cure" and served only one to a guest in the interest of the preservation of some measure of decorum and sanity, and in a really admirable harp player named Caspar Reardon. There are also Lester, the best barkeep of the Gold Coast; Camille, the waiter captain appointed to the special gratification of the Fiske whims and known as Frenchie; a wine list of imposing proportions, and, of course, Ernie Byfield himself, who, like George Jean Nathan, makes it a point to be seen with only the most beautiful women available. Populate the Pump Room with such Windy City characters as the very fashionable Mr. Peter Moon, Margaret Perry, Eddy Duchin, Averell Harriman, June Provines, of the Tribune; Lee Carson, of "The Times"; John Barrymore, Richard Aldrich, Craig Cummings, Marie Correll, all the essential Fields, Swifts and Armours, and whatever celebrities happen to be rushing from the Century of the Super Chief, or vice versa, and toss in the explosive Mr. Fiske for good measure, and you have something as nearly as is practical approaching bedlam or Halloween. For sheer howling, screaming, cork popping and the service of Pain's fireworks dishes, the Pump Room has any restaurant west of the Hudson licked at the starting post, and with Fiske dominating its drolleries, for all the world as Beau Nash, the glamour boy of his time, presided over the original Pump Room at Bath, you've

The trees along the Fifth avenue side of Rockefeller Center have been swathed in burlap for about 15 feet above the ground. They are given regular doses of medicine through the roots. But they look quite ill, and long ago they gave up their leaves. If they survive this winter, scientific tree-doctoring will have a large plume to wear in its cap.

A New York traffic policeman made one of those spectacular plays in stopping a runaway team the other day. The driver of a horse-drawn dray had pulled up at a watering place. Humanely, he removed the bits from the horses' mouths to permit them to drink comfortably from a bucket.

While he was filling the bucket, the team made a dash for nowhere. Madly careening down a busy street, the express wagon was endangering lives. A traffic policeman at an intersection jumped upon the tailboard as the wagon lurched past him, ran forward, jumped upon the back of one of the powerful horses. Seeing that the bits were swinging free, the agile patrolman crept forward upon the beast's neck and clamped both hands over the nostrils of the runaway.

That horse soon came to a dead stop, and the other was dragged back with it.

The policeman sprained one ankle and was badly bruised when he fell to the pavement with the conquered horse.

Many New York policemen are expert horsemen. My friend, Oscar Strobel, of Arizona, who lives with horses most of the year, talked with several men of the mounted squads in Manhattan. "They know as much about horses as any cowboy," he told me.

Well, here's to the cop on the beat!
In cold, snow, rain, hail or heat
He is always on hand,
Though it's no fun to stand
All day long on your tired, aching feet!

There is much rivalry between and among private secretaries. No secretary, for instance, will permit another secretary to keep the first secretary's boss waiting on the telephone for a man whom she doesn't consider as important as her boss. Calling back and forth for information about this and that boss, the secretaries come to know one another's voices and mannerisms.

Hancey Castle, a mid-town secretary in the radio offices, "We waste so much time in fighting out preliminaries on the telephone! I think each secretary to an important person should have a musical signature that would sound as soon as the party at the other end of the wire picks up the phone. Then, right down to the main business, with all preliminaries ruled out!"

Irving Berlin, the hard-working composer, handles much business from his table at the Chambord restaurant, in Third avenue. I saw him there the other evening, nonchalantly sending off messengers, answering telephones, scratching notes on a pad. He is volatile, active, but hardly what you'd call nervous.

Berlin is known to everyone as the fellow who has come along so far since he was a singing waiter, 'way downtown. Still, that wasn't such a bad job, and it gave the boy a chance to show his stuff. When I waited table in Miss Cook's boarding house in Wichita, they wouldn't even let me sing. On second thought, maybe it was just as well for the prosperity of the house that I didn't try it.

Woolcott Gibbs, who has written some of the best of the New Yorker profiles, is a nervous young man, and smokes incessantly. Twice he has been in danger because of setting his bedding afire while dozing and smoking. He is a blond young man with light mustache, wears glasses, usually dresses becomingly in gray. His portraits of Alexander Woollcott and Henry Luce were devastatingly realistic.

Conscience Was His Guide . . . .

By Weare Holbrook

PEOPLE who didn't know Elzevir Whinnery very well used to refer to him as the original of H. T. Webster's "Caspar Milquetoast." But Elzevir wasn't timid, he was just conscientious. When he closed the cover of a match packet before striking a light it didn't mean that he feared explosions, but simply that the packet bore the printed admonition to "Close Cover Before Striking."

In restaurants Elzevir watched his hat and coat, tipped an exact 10 per cent, and never requested substitutions for spinach on the blue-plate special. If he started reading a book and found it disappointing he kept on to the bitter end, believing that the author should be given every possible chance to redeem himself. At baseball games he recorded each play neatly on his score card, and when the game was over he deposited the card carefully in the waste-paper receptacle on the sidewalk outside the ball park.

He remembered the birthdays of all his family connections and sent greetings every year, even to remote female relatives who would have been quite willing to let bygones be bygones. His dentist never had to mail him semi-annual reminders, nor did the garage man have to tell him when it was time to have the oil in the crank case changed. Elzevir kept track of things like that.

But it was as a traveler that Elzevir let his conscientious impulses rampant. To him travel was more than a mere getting from one place to another; it was an educational adventure, a harvesting of facts. When Elzevir went to New York City as a delegate to the Retail Swivel and Grommet Dealers' Convention, his expense money was not squandered in night clubs and honky-tonks. In addition to sitting through all the executive sessions of the convention, he managed to visit the Statue of Liberty, Trinity Churchyard, Faunce's Tavern, Chinatown, the Empire State Tower, Radio City, the Metropolitan Museum, Cleopatra's Needle, Grant's Tomb, the Jumel Mansion, Poe's Cottage, the Hall of Fame and the Bronx Zoo.

Whenever Elzevir Whinnery went motoring he kept his eyes open for roadside markers—not the shields and disks bearing route numbers, but the embossed plaques that are put up by State and county historical societies to indicate places where important events have occurred.

The average motorist tools past these marginal memorials as nonchalantly as if they were so many shaving cream advertisements. But every time Elzevir saw one in the offing he said to himself, "Someone went to a lot of trouble and expense to put up that inscription; the least I can do is to stop and read it." So he did.

Last fall Elzevir Whinnery took a motor trip through New England. He covered only a few hundred miles, but the plaques and markers along this route were so numerous that the trip took him a full month. One thing led to another: a roadside cenotaph would arouse a curiosity which was not satisfied until he had visited the birthplace, home and burying ground of the departed dignitary, and he dutifully collected all the picture postcards and descriptive leaflets pertaining to the neighborhood. He saw Revolutionary blockhouses, weather-cocks that had been riddled with bullets by Cornwallis' men, Indian burial mounds, trees under which treaties had been signed and from which traitors had been hung, old well-sweeps and smithy's forges, deserted lighthouses, shot towers and smuggler's caves.

He dined at innumerable taverns which once had sheltered Washington, Lafayette and lesser notables; he visited countless meeting houses and solemnly inspected the pews where the rude forefathers of the village used to sleep on Sunday morning. And wherever he went, bronze plaques met his eye, assuring him that this particular tree, tavern or tomb was the genuine McCoy.

After his prolonged rendezvous with the relics, Elzevir returned to East Teabone, bubbling over with antiquarian enthusiasm. He set about immediately organizing the East Teabone Historical Society, whose purpose was to be the erection of monuments, markers and memorials celebrating important persons and events in local history. The first meeting of the society was a success, from a social and financial standpoint. Judge Ponderby, Dr. Pennifeather, Mr. Milfret and practically all of the slightly older younger set attended and willingly paid the charter membership fee.

But when Elzevir and his fellow members got down to brass tacks and bronze plaques, they discovered that East Teabone really didn't have any local history worth celebrating. It had been founded—or rather subdivided—in the early nineteen hundreds by an enterprising real estate operator named Plotz. Mr. Plotz had never even lived there himself, and little was known about him except that he was connected with an oilstock promotion scheme which had necessitated his hasty departure to Canada. As a founding father, he didn't seem quite the type that the historical society was looking for.

So far as could be ascertained, no colonial troops had ever camped in or around East Teabone, nor had any Indian massacres taken place there. The town had a fair-sized cemetery, but all the headstones were of recent vintage; it had trees, but no treaties had ever been signed beneath them.

There was no shortage of birthplaces, but they were not birthplaces of famous people. East Teabone never produced a Hollywood beauty-contest winner. The oldest native son was a mere stripling of thirty-five, with no reminiscences to speak of. His name was Ed Zinsinbrinner, and he was studying air conditioning by mail.

All this was pretty discouraging for Elzevir Whinnery as president of the historical society. There he was, with enough money in the treasury to buy dozens of bronze plaques—and no place to put them.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he announced at the third monthly meeting of the society, "we must face the facts—or rather the absence of facts. East Teabone as it stands today offers nothing of historical interest. It is too young. However, that may be an advantage in a way—it gives us a better opportunity to build for the future. For example, the chances are that the first building ever erected in East Teabone is still standing, somewhere in this vicinity.

"I propose, ladies and gentlemen, that we seek it out and give it the recognition that it will some day deserve. Future generations will appreciate our foresight!"

A diligent search through the records at the courthouse established the fact that the first building erected in East Teabone was a one-story dwelling of the "coffee-grinder" type. It had passed from its original owner a Mr. Swenson, to a large Italian family named Squattulatti, who maintained an automobile junk yard. For a modest cash consideration the Squattulattis were persuaded to give up their home, and it became the headquarters of the East Teabone Historical Society.

Elzevir was delighted with the Swenson-Squattulatti house, for, unlike everything else in town, it really showed signs of age—the roof sagged, there were several bricks missing from the chimney top and the unpainted clapboards had weathered a silvery gray.

But what pleased Elzevir most was the front steps. They were actually worn down until the edges were sloping and treacherous, like the steps on some old New England meeting houses. True, the latter were of stone, while these were wooden, but the evidence of prolonged usage was there, nevertheless.

In the front yard, where the wrecks of automobiles had formerly reposed, Elzev put up a large bronze and marble marker identifying the Swenson-Squattulatti house as the oldest human habitation in East Teabone. The building itself was given a coat of white paint and a general sprucing up befitting a shrine for possible tourists. But the steps, Elzevir insisted, should remain just as they were.

And these steps, which were his pride, eventually proved his downfall. One snowy day the following winter Elzevir slipped on their well-worn surface and fell down, striking his head on the edge of the porch. He died that night, without regaining consciousness.

In accordance with the stipulations in his will, Elzevir was cremated, and, as no provision had been made for the disposal of the ashes, the East Teabone Historical Society voted to keep them at its headquarters in the Swenson-Squattulatti house, where a caretaker was instructed to sprinkle a few of them over the front whenever it became covered with snow and ice.

And today a handsome bronze plaque adorns the porch of the Swenson-Squattulatti house. It reads: YOU ARE NOT FALLING DOWN IN MEMORY OF ELZEVIR WHINNERY.

Elzevir would have liked that.

Elzevir Whinnery took life seriously. He never failed to remember a relative's birthday, even when it might better be forgotten, and he thought that historical markers were meant to be read. It was when he looked for something historical in East Teabone that his downfall came.

Dale Carnegie Says—

THE FOLLOWING LETTER from Mrs. Edith Allred, Route 3, Mount Airy, N. C., is entered in the contest, "How I Cured My Inferiority Complex." Through overhearing a chance remark, she was able to change her whole life:

"I had an old-fashioned mother who never put forth the least effort to keep up with things. She believed that 'wide will wear when narrow will tear' and made my dresses accordingly. I was overweight, my cheeks made me appear even larger, and I was naturally sensitive. I never went in for athletics or any of the extra good times included in school life. I felt myself different and entirely undesirable.

"Afterward, I married a man several years my senior, but matters were altered little. My in-laws were a poised, self-confident family; everything that I should have been, but was not. I tried my best to grow like them, but my efforts were fruitless. Each attempt made me draw further into my shell. I grew nervous and irritable, and avoided contact with my friends. I even dreaded to hear the door bell. I was so afraid that my husband would become aware of the failure he had married, that I would overact my part, and consequently I developed unnaturalness of manner. When we were in a crowd I would assume an exaggerated gay mood, and then I was miserable for days afterward. I got to the place that I even contemplated suicide. I knew that I was a misfit and there was no use for me to try longer.

"A chance remark made me change my opinion. One day my mother-in-law, in speaking of her tactics in the raising of her children, said that no matter what advice she gave one of them, she insisted that he be his own individual self. In a flash I realized I had been missing so many of the good things of life by trying to fit myself to a pattern that I would never fit.

"From that day, I started a new pattern, and the weaving of it hasn't been accomplished in a day. I studied my own personality and decided on my strong points. I learned all I could about clothes, styles and colors, that best suited my type. To know that I was dressed becomingly increased my self-confidence more than anything else could.

"I joined a small organization. When I was put on the program I was petrified; but each time I added courage. I now serve with complete confidence; I haven't the least dread of facing people.

"I have so completely obliterated self from my thoughts that sometimes I am amazed. I have had more happiness, as a result, than I have dreamed possible. I find myself accomplishing things that I thought would ever be removed far from me. I see myself self-confident, fully capable of handling even the most difficult situation courageously. I have never gone into business, but I have striven to make a success of the rearing of my children, and I have reason to feel justly proud. I have guided them into channels different from the ones through which I went, and I learned it all from a chance remark."

Football Girls—And Why

PORTAL 12, ROW 15, SEAT 16: Here sits what every undergraduate should know—and plenty do. Miss Buelah Devine. Miss Devine last year danced 1,421,396 miles, with an average of 1,227 partners to a mile. She attended 21 proms and 26 house parties, and collected a great deal of loot in the way of engagement rings, fraternity pins and gadgets for her charm bracelet. Miss Devine is present at the game this afternoon to encourage her fiances, who are one of the cheerleaders, one of the backs, and two of the tackles.

PORTAL 8, ROW 6, SEAT 4: Miss Rosalie Brett, of New York and Newport, whose father has $17,000,000. Miss Brett has nice teeth (i.e., "We-ell, no, she isn't much to look at—but she has nice teeth.") This is Miss Brett's first gridiron classic in 25 yearning years, but she doesn't intend that anyone should guess it. Her comments are impressive. "'Offside?'" she echoes, very loudly. "Why, that's ridiculous! They were every one right squarely in the middle!"

Miss Brett is present because Mrs. Henry H. K. Haynes, matrimonially ambitious mama of Fat Haynes, '41, brought pressure to bear.

PORTAL 10, ROW 11, SEAT 8: None other than Pink O'Neill. You know Pink. The life of the party. The wag who kicked all the light bulbs out last night at the Psi U dance . . . Pink stands on her seat with her back to the field and looks the customers over. Between the halves and during such lulls as are occasioned by substitutions, casualties, thirst, torn pants and the huddle system, she is to be heard Hoo-Hooing to friends in portals adjacent. She is to be heard inquiring how they feel, where they've been keeping themselves, what they're going to do after the game, and whether or not Geraldine and Ed came with them.

She is present, in short, so that B. W. Havemeyer, of Racine, Wis., who paid a scalper $20 for a 40-yard-line seat (the seat behind her) will see the folly of his ways—if he sees nothing more.

PORTAL 4, ROW 21, SEAT 12: Miss Constance Kent. Complexion by Hudnut. Lashes by Winxit. Lips by Guerlain. Escort by James Montgomery Flagg. Conversational line by goodness knows who-all—practically everybody she listens to, from Charlie McCarthy to Donald Duck.

Miss Kent is 15, and a little tired of it all. She used to adore football games, but now they leave her cold. Such a fuss over nothing! As if it mattered! Child's play, definitely. She blows long strings of smoke, and watches them vanish, and hopes there'll be somebody interesting at the tea dance afterward. But she isn't very sanguine about it.

Miss Kent is present because the boy who invited her is the very one about whom her roommate at school is But Simply Ma-a-ad—and of course, you wouldn't pass up a chance like that.

PORTAL 20, ROW 19, SEAT 7: Contains Mrs. Dolly Archer and the skins of 207½ deceased weasels. Mrs. Archer, though twice divorced, is only 21. After all, I'm only 20."—Dolly Archer in Any Gathering.)

With Mrs. Archer is a valuable early American Antique, vclept Mr. L. Pierce Perkins, prominent clubman. Mrs. Archer and Mr. Perkins are just good friends. ("Absurd!) We are just good friends."—L.

Leaves From a Sportsman's Diary

Washingtonian Sees Nature in Many Moods as He Follows Capital's Bridle Paths and Park Trails

By Samuel J. Henry.

A RIDER'S RANGE OF observation depends largely on his mount. If the horse happens to be a skittish thoroughbred, the type that bears constant watching, the passing scene is largely ignored because the business of staying in the saddle demands undivided attention.

On the other hand, should your Pegasus happen to be calm and sweet tempered, and not seeking to ditch you, the charm of the countryside, with its bird and animal life, is a never ending source of pleasure and amazement. Upon every hand we find nature expressing herself, and whether regarded as a cruel vixen or beneficent matron, her moods are infinite. She acts as she darn well pleases—shocking, gratifying, disappointing us. Yet she never fails to be interesting, and when she sets the stage and calls forth her actors, the fortunate spectator is confronted with a dramatic gem, sometimes a comedy, or a love episode or perchance a tragedy.

WE SEE the loitering meadow lark, tardy in her leave taking, feeding under the waving golden rod, now wilted and gray. The bird's high-sweet note rings out clear as the upper tones of a Galli-Curci.

In the fields the pollen-laden ragweed and hedges aflame with the hot, red coloring of poison oak. Nuthatches nodding and clinging head down on the meadow elm and the swamp willow, searching for insect larvae.

The iron weed's purple blossom—how our horses love it. Among the lesser growth the quail feed with rash impunity, daintily pecking the seeds at will. Now pipes the cock bird, alone, from distant stubble. Preening their serrate wings, a group of females, nun-like in their modesty, blink at the sun or seek the wild timothy seeds, the cedar berries and coon grapes.

A troup of noisy, roving jays, shrieking and enjoying the sound of their own racket. We pass a farm yard where a gamecock crows upon a bare fence rail. High in the air—motionless—the coward hawk with watchful, measuring eye. Again the crested jay's quick, defiant cry—how the other birds hate these villainous sneaks and cowards, robbers of eggs and young.

Croaking crows—a noisy, garrulous lot. A pair of killdees, headed South, screaming high in the air. Rabbit hounds yelping down near the creek and a couple of shots.

One of my fellow riders tells an episode of his youth. His mother objected to a hound which he had brought home, but finally she consented to allow the dog to remain. One day she cooked 15 pies against an expected visit from relatives and friends. The hound got into the pantry and ate every last pie.

An old hunter who rides with us relates an experience. He declares that he once chased a coon which went into a hole. Among the pursuers was a dog named Bull, and Bull went in after the coon. Pretty soon out came bulldog and the coon. The coon had Bull by the nose and held on viciously. The dog flung the coon around and around, the coon's tail flying in the air and his teeth firmly in the dog's nose. It was a ludicrous sight. Mr. Coon held on until a hound came to Bull's assistance and when Bull got free he sneezed loudly and ran off.

Our storyteller went on and told about hunting wildcat in the Mississippi flat lands. Once a group of hunters caught a cat alive and belled it. The varmint almost starved to death because game, hearing the bell, ran off.

Alligators know when a dog enters the water. They don't have to see or hear him. One man took a pack of hounds to Florida from Virginia. His dogs disappeared one by one until half of the pack were gone, and then a native told him the 'gators were getting his hounds.

We called our loquacious friend Squire Snaffle. He was about 70 but keen as a briar; he remembered everything he had ever seen or heard; he swore with shocking and picturesque symbols and said he had one leg in the grave and the other in the stirrup but if God would permit him he intended to live to a hundred.

Luckily for me when I came upon the incident I am about to describe, I had a leg up on a mare named Trixie, who, while agile enough for polo and bold as a lion in the hunting field, nevertheless is at all times subject to every wish of her rider. The day was a hot one in mid-August, and Trixie and I were dawdling along on a dirt road in vicinity of the Congressional Club when arising from an adjoining stubble field I observed little puffs of dust.

Turning the mare off the road and approaching slowly, I found a large brownish bird fluttering violently and at intervals lying quietly on its side. At first I thought the creature had been brought down by gun shot. As Trixie reluctantly carried me closer and closer, she emitted the peculiar snort which in horses and cattle denotes fear and is sometimes the preliminary warning of a wild stampede. This of course brought my curiosity to a high pitch, and proceeding within close range, I ascertained the cause of the bird's dilemma and the mare's apprehension.

Its shiny form now visible in the brilliant sunlight, and holding a hawk firmly in its coils, a big black snake—always taboo by horses—was slowly squeezing the bird to death while the latter, with one wing free and obviously weakened, struggled frantically to break the vise-like [illegible].

Fascinated by the odd struggle, I sat motionless for a short interval and then dismounted, whereupon the reptile decided that the man, not the hawk, was his immediate enemy, and slowly releasing his hold, he slithered from view as his erstwhile antagonist rose aloft and flew away.

The aggressor, no doubt, was the hawk, for they are voracious feeders with insatiable appetites. They disdain carrion of all kinds, as well as seeds, berries and fruit, and only feed on freshly killed flesh. No doubt this particular bird will long remember the black reptile that girded himself so close as not only to save his own life, but came perilously near crushing his enemy to death.

Midwinter, however, is the best time to observe the falcon family. They seem always to be hungry, and birds—if not too large—as well as small mammals are always subject to their ferocity. With merciless talons and powerful beaks they have eyes of microscopic power, and perched on the topmost branch of a dead tree, they are able to survey an enormous range of country.

When not on the lookout they are often observed hanging on the skirts of the open fields or flying low in search of a victim.

One January morning as I cantered through a rolling pasture I saw one of the predatory birds rise from the ground with an object held in his talons close up to the body.

That the victim was not utterly helpless I guessed from the gyrations of the hawk which mounting higher and higher, from time to time rapidly descended, and as he got close to the ground, appeared as if endeavoring to cast off his tenacious prey. After the plummet-like drop, the bird once soared in the air at tremendous speed.

This rising and "slooping" was repeated for the space of several minutes and ended when the hawk fell straight to the ground.

As the bird lay motionless, a small creature was seen calmly moving off, which I was able to identify as a weasel. He had, after capture, fastened his teeth into the hawk's stomach, where, hanging on with tenacity, he had eventually punctured his raptor's intestines.

The feathered pirate of course was dead from the fall—if not before—while the spunky little mammal appeared none the worse for his experience.

Now, if Mr. Hawk's victim had happened to be a partridge, you need only say, "Quickly he seized her and bit through her neck," a fate similar to that of pigeons participating in the Plattsburg, N. Y., war games. The Signal Corps reports that out of a total of 42 birds used in the August maneuvers, 13 were killed and five wounded by the pirates of the air.

Tribute to a Hound

THEY BURIED Seba today. From a barn filled with thoroughbred horses and a kennel occupied by two score hounds, they buried the great Seba, buried him down in the meadow with the honeysuckle sweet in the air and the wood thrush and mourning dove tolling his requiem.

Yet to scores of hunting folk who had known the big flop-eared, white and tan hound, Seba is not dead. They will be listening fo Seba's booming challenge in the fields and woodlands of Maryland; they will be hearing him far off as he holds the tenuous line and works out a red fox's ravellings, or races forward on the stout-hearted distant point.

Seba's habit of friendliness, his strong, well shaped body, his loyal, eloquent eyes and his ability to make the best of hounds sometimes look like amateurs, will long endure in the land of the diamond back terrapin and the epicurean mallard where the fox and the hound have fought it out for nigh on three centuries—and where they are still a-fightin.'

Seba wasn't only a fox hound. In the parlance of the Negroes, he was "Spo'ting folks," for his acquaintances included race horse men, devotees of the cocking mains, statesmen from nearby Washington and high society folk. Of late, See, as they called him, hadn't always run with the pack. With age and the concomitants thereof creeping up on him, he had been allowed the free run of his master's mansion and its spacious grounds. Had not time called two strikes on See and had not his sight become bleared and his legs a bit wobbly?

Only three years ago and big, genial Seba could fight his way around the toughest terrain in a fashion that houndsmen, with never a spark of envy in their hearts, derived pleasure in applauding with a sportsman's unstinted praise.

He was not the fastest of fox-shovin' hounds like Lancelot, Hannibal, or Sibyl. But when many dogs with bleeding feet and pollen-filled eyes lost interest and bedded down in the woods, or crept back to the fire, Seba was out there hitting and hitting hard. And he stayed until the tones of the pleading horn persuaded him to haul up and call it a day. On one occasion he failed to come in, and the men sent on the search found him curled up in the snow at the den where his quarry had sought safe sanctuary. Carried to his master's buggy, Seba survived and lived to run again.

They'll miss Seba around the fox country of the tolerant Free State. When the leaves begin to fall, when the pokeberry and the coongrape are tempting food for the jay and the mocker, many a weary hunter, cold and drowsy in the pale lights of a frosty dawn, will awake with a start, cup his ears and exclaim, "Hush, boys, that's old Seba. I hear him on the ridge and he's a-comin' this way."

The Gun-Shy Boy

The wind this morning was cold and raw and blew steadily from the North. As Step, my mount, walked down the frozen rutty road that led from the kennels, adjoining the old horse show grounds in Montgomery County, the sun shone brightly, yet afforded little warmth. The mercury stood at 22 degrees.

Step, who had recently been clipped, began to prance about. The cold made him fidgety, so I turned him out of the road onto a grassy field and he, sensing my feeling that a bit of action would be a good thing, soon broke into a lively canter. I shoved him into his bridle. He responded gamely, and with his blood up, he fairly tore along. At the end of three miles we arrived at Persimmon Tree road where, protected from the gale by a forest of pine trees, I eased the horse into a walk. Pretty soon we crossed the River road and entered the Man O'War drive that leads through a stand of virgin timber. There were great oaks and hickory trees, also the wild dogwood and pine.

Rarely does one encounter owls in the day. However, on several occasions I have come across an enormous specimen of the nocturnal bird in these woods. Generally he is perched on the stout limb of an oak tree. Of course, Mr. Owl does not remain there when I am around, but taking flight, soon disappears into the timber.

Sometime I shall drive my car into the forest at night, and with the headlights penetrating the stygian darkness, sit there silently and watch what happens. No doubt the strange illumination will attract many birds and mammals. Foxes and coons and weasels and, of course, owls, although I doubt whether the curiosity of such creatures as field mice or wood rats would get the better of their instinctive caution.

The Man O'War path twists and turns for mile after mile and finally emerges on a cedar lined lane. Here the wind appeared to have lost some of its velocity, a condition which I welcomed, as riding on a windy day is surely not riding at its best. Step cantered through the flat country, after which, while mounting a steep hill, I came across a woman struggling with a boy of about five years of age. In spite of the bitter cold, neither had on hat or coat, and while I was trying to figure out what it's all about, the women explains. She says the boy, frightened by the firing of gunners near their home, had dashed out of the house and, running straight down the road, had traversed almost a mile before she succeeded in overtaking him.

"Gun shy?" I inquired, "Like certain dogs?"

"Yes, sir," she replied, "and I don't think he will ever get over it. My father owned a gun shy puppy named Flash which came from his best hunting gyp, and although he did everything he could to cure Flash, as a field dog he turned out utterly worthless."

"You will have plenty to worry about now that the hunting season is on," I said. "Why don't you send the boy away?"

"Oh no, sir," replied, "I am not going to let it bother me. Tommie has just got to be tied up as he was last year. I can't be chasing him four or five times a day . . . there is too much work to do."

After tossing Tommie a coin, which seemed to ease his frightened condition, I was about to reassure him, when "Bang! Bang!" came roaring over the countryside. The poor little fellow tugged frantically to break away; his face turned pale and his eyes took on the panicky look of a hunted animal. Sorry for both the lad and his mother, yet realizing that I was helpless to assist them, I gave Step the word and moved off.

No Right of Way

IT WAS SPRING in the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia, a hot, languid sort of a day when the world seems to stand still and you feel drowsy and lazy. Bill Ryan and I, on horses from the resort hotel, rode the bridle path in Indian file, he first and I following. Suddenly I heard a familiar, ominous sound, whereupon Bill's horse whirled and trembling with fear joined my mount.

There on the trail in front of us was a big snake with his head and tail in the air, rattling repeatedly and defying us to approach. I cracked my long thonged hound whip at him, but the lash falling short, did not affect him in the least. Thinking that a pair of horses would, surely put him to flight, we urged them forward. The snake held his ground, however, and needless to say there was no power on earth that could drive the animals within a dozen paces of his brown mottled body.

Days Spent Out of Doors Are Filled With Unusual Experiences, Glimpses Of Wild Animals in Natural Habitat

Mount Vernon

WASHINGTON, the horseman, has ever gripped my imagination, and one novelty which I would like to enjoy is a ride on horseback down the lanes and paths he traveled as he inspected his farms and superintended the labors of his slaves. However, it seems one cannot go hacking over Mount Vernon, so here I am on foot.

It is 9 o'clock on an October morn. Beside the path that leads from the mansion sings a silver-throated mockingbird. The quick, defiant cry of a villainous bluejay jars horribly. Hundreds of purple grackles feeding beneath the trees are headed southward on their autumn migration. The sheen of their plumage glistens in the sun. Cawing crows and flighty robins.

I come upon the modest tomb where clings the ancient ivy. There are cedars of a blackish green hue. Myrtle covers the ground. Beyond the iron grill Washington on the right and Martha on the left, his encased coffin considerately longer than hers. Over the scene a sweet, brooding silence; no horror here of death.

Gorgeous in fall coloring, the forest is a riot of burning red, old gold and russet. Rising aloft, the ecstatic mocker repeats his eulogy, the sheer joy of life almost unbearable. Honey bees, pollen laden, winging rapidly through the soft, balmy air. Overhead a cloudless azure sky and the sun filtering through the foliage onto the dewy grass traces, fantastic patterns of light and shadow.

From Fort Washington, across the broad, dreamy Potomac, drifts the faint call of a bugle. Near the shore fishermen traversing their trot line for carp. Vacant ducking blinds farther out. A low-hanging mist obscuring the Maryland shore. The lap, lap of water against the wharf. On the river the sun glistens, converting the rippling surface into a strip of polished platinum. The startled, cluttering cry of the kingfisher.

Once more the sound of the bugle and the drum. A crackling of leaves at my feet and a moving turtle. Two big carp hauled into the boat by the silent fisherman. On the ground a fallen locust tree. But in their prime noble oaks and maples, gums and elms. Over by Belvoir, Lord Fairfax's estate, now Fort Belvoir, a couple of rabbit hounds trail their quarry.

Up the path to the white-columned mansion house of George Washington. It has two fronts—one on the river and one on the driveway. A white-bearded patriarch, serving as guide for over a third of a century, has me join him on a settee in the hallway. He declared there are countless legends about the general. Once while hunting he was threatened by a farmer who swore he would shoot any trespasser. Washington calmly turned to Billy Lee, his Negro huntsman, and said, "Billy, if he shoots me, you shoot him. Proceed."

Said the kindly old guide, "Houdon, the sculptor, was sent from France by Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson. He came to model a figure of the general for the Virginia Assembly and spent 17 days here before he completed his task. The resulting plaster bust, which you will find over yonder in our museum, from an artistic standpoint, is the most valuable treasure at Mount Vernon."

I sought information about the kennels, and asked where they had been located. "You are the second man to ask that question," said the guide. "It has never aroused interest."

"Who was the other?" I asked. "Probably a fox hunter."

"The Prince of Wales," he replied, and added, "The hounds were kenneled on a site down near the tomb—far enough from the mansion to prevent their baying becoming an annoyance."

As I sat in the hall with the loquacious old fellow at my side I let my imagination run back to Washington's last birthday. It was in 1799. Down those steps, robed as a bride, trod the apple of the general's eye, the beautiful Nelly Custis, to be given in marriage by her step-grandfather. Attired for the last time in his old buff and blue Continental uniform, he awaited her at the foot of the stairs.

I walked out on the flagstone portico which faces southeast. Across the river lay the gently rolling country of tidewater Maryland. The Potomac, up and down stream, is visible for miles—a scene ennobling, inspiring and soothing. Such a sight calls forth the best in any man, and I reflected that Washington is Mount Vernon and Mount Vernon, Washington. Sloping from the lawn down to the water is the old deer park, now abandoned. But I well remember when a herd roamed the inclosure, for boy and man I have been familiar with the hallowed land for over 50 years.

The brick stable, with sharply slanted shingle roof, intrigued me. In those stalls munching their oats have stood Blueskin and Magnolia, Nelson and the pacing racer, also the cranky jackass, Royal Gift—a present from the King of Spain. What men have had their horses saddled here!

What hunts after the fleet, subtle fox; lathered steeds and deep baying hounds; the resounding horn; the spirited View Halloo and reckless riders determined to be in at the death—a strong muscled, strong stomached and brilliantly minded gentry.

On more serious business galloped forth the Commander-in-Chief, after a September night at the mansion, enroute from the North to the siege of Yorktown—and the surrender of Cornwallis. Rode, too, the Master, with Patrick Henry and Edmund Pendleton, with the Lees and George Mason—to Annapolis and Williamsburg, to Boston, New York and Philadelphia—to the Virginia Assembly, the Continental Congress and the Constitutional Convention.

Again the martial bugle and the roll of drum from over the river—inspection at the fort—and the great Commander-in-Chief asleep on the hill.

Photographs Exhibited At Library

Fine Arts Division of Library of Congress Continues Show by Frances B. Johnson

By Jane Watson

The display of photographs of early Southern architecture by Frances Benjamin Johnston, arranged to coincide with the convention of the American Institute of Architects, which terminated here two days ago, will continue in the division of fine arts at the Library of Congress for an indefinite period. It provides an opportunity not only to see some of the less familiar phases of Southern architecture and to review a cross section of a collection of considerable documentary importance, but also to enjoy some really superb photography.

Miss Johnston's prowess in her field is well known and her photographs have been shown in Washington before. Since 1933 she has had seven successive grants from the Carnegie Coproration, of New York, to make a photographic record of the early architecture of the Southern States. Over 5,000 of her prints are already in the files of the Library of Congress, part of the Pictorial Archives of Early American Architecture, begun by Dr. Leicester Holland, chief of the fine arts division, on the strength, incidentally, of Miss Johnston's original offer to make available her negatives to the public.

Photographed Architecture

Behind Miss Johnston's present achievement is a long record of perseverance and application. She began her career as a news photographer at the turn of the century, and had the courage, imagination and good sense to grasp the possibilities of the camera long before it reached its current vogue and high degree of mechanical perfection. At first content with obtaining "a good likeness," she soon realized that a camera could be used as a sensitive medium for recording visual experience. Some people call this obtaining "atmosphere," some call it "art." Scoffers call it nonsense. But while there is nothing pretentious or arty about Miss Johnston's work, her photographs unquestionably have a quality which lifts them way beyond mere mechanical recording, which is all the more remarkable since she has also been able through her photography to meet the exacting professional demands of the architects.

Miss Johnston's most recent expedition has taken her to Alabama and North Carolina, two States which have been pretty well overshadowed by the well-known architectural splendors of their immediate neighbors. Those who are already familiar with her illustrations of the early architecture of Virginia, Maryland, South Carolina and New Orleans, will be especially interested in these photographs. The Alabama houses are largely in the neo-classic manner of the first half, of the nineteenth century, those of North Carolina resembling the buildings we still see in Georgetown and in nearby Maryland and Virginia. However, the most striking photograph from North Carolina is perhaps the handsome, albeit somewhat florid, front view of the later Belo house at Winston-Salem, which has the traditional tall white pillars (deceptively and very successfully made from cast iron), a decorative iron fence and a dignified iron dog reposing on the foreground. Other notable buildings she has photographed previously in this State and included in the exhibition are Judge O'Donnell's house at New Bern, and the earlier Court House at Edenton. Among the reproductions from Alabama are a number of houses in Mobile, in which iron railings and balconies are featured; and a group including the university president's house at Tuscaloosa.

Southern Pictures

Among the plantation pictures, one of the loveliest is that of "Parlange," in Louisiana, built about 1820, with its high, sloping roof planned to catch the rain water on which the plantation was dependent. Here the Spanish influence is seen, though not as pronounced as in the Fatio house at St. Augustine, Fla., which is also shown. Among the interior views are a detail from "Propinquity," a Mississippi plantation; and the famous staircase from "Sophia's Dairy," in Maryland, which is now to be preserved as a recreation center in a shoe-making plant, the property of a famous Czecho-Slovakian firm.

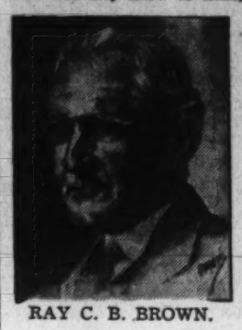
Musical Riches Hardly Touched by Concerts

By Ray C. B. Brown.

So accustomed have concert-goers become to the routined type of program that one is justified in the belief that they have an idea how very limited is their knowledge of musical literature. It is not their fault that they know so little, for they have to accept what is offered them, and the general practice of those who provide us with music is to keep on the main-traveled road with an occasional excursion on a byway. The theory seems to be that audiences might rise in rebellion unless they are continually appeased with familiar compositions, whereas the revolt, when and if it comes, is more likely to be provoked by impatience with a stultifying procedure which deprives music-lovers of acquaintance with thousands of compositions large and small.



RAY C. B. BROWN.

The most faithful habitue of concert halls must confess that he has heard only a few of Mozart's 44 symphonies and the 104 by Haydn. He must open an encyclopedia to learn that Dvorak composed eight symphonies besides "From the New World" and five symphonic poems, any one of which is as much worth hearing as the "Carniaval Overture." He must admit his complete ignorance of Nikolai Myaskovski, the only living composer who can boast of having written 18 symphonies. If he is at all curious about unperformed music, he feels like asking a few questions, such as these:

Why do we never have the opportunity to hear one or all of the 11 symphonies by Raff, the nine by Spohr, the six by Rubinstein, the three by Max Bruch, the three by Edward Burlingame Hill, or the two by John Knowles Paine? What has become of Liszt's symphonic poems: "Orpheus," "Prometheus," "Mazepa," "Hamlet" and "Hunnenschlacht?" Why are Edward MacDowell's symphonic poems, "Hamlet and Ophelia," "Lancelot and Elaine" and "Lamia" never played? Why is Georg Schumann's "Dance of Nymphs and Satyrs" always preferred to his three overtures and two symphonies? Why is the "Sailors' Dance" the only excerpt ever given us from Glier's ballet, "Krasni Mak?"

These random queries, which only touch the fringe of neglected orchestral music, are for conductors to answer. If we turn to the department of song, the recitalists will have to face a more embarrassing barrage. Singers profess reverence for Schubert's lieder, yet how pitifully few of his 603 songs do they ever allow us to hear; they acknowledge the greatness of Hugo Wolf, yet they give us a mere handful of his 260 lyrics. They apparently think that a dozen are all that we need to know of the 138 lieder by Richard Strauss, and that 50 is a generous allowance from the 197 songs by Brahms.

Such is the wealth of song literature that no singer would have to repeat the same program in an entire career before the public. Here are a few composers and the number of their songs, taken haphazard from the records: Reginald de Koven, 400; Robert Franz, 300; Max Reger, 250; Cesar Cui, 200; Max Mayer, 200; Margaret Ruthven Lang, 200; Peter Lange-Mueller, 200; Christian Sinding, 200; Adolf Jensen, 160; Henry Hadley, 150; Arthur Fotte, 130; Reinhold Glier, 125; Greig, 124; Karol Szymanovski, 120; Ippolitov-Ivanov, 116; Shumann, 100; Chaikovski, 100; Paul Graener, 100; Nikolai Medtner, 100; Oley Speaks, 100; Ferdinand Hiller, 100; Clayton Johns, 100; Gabriel Faure, 90; Sibelius, 80; Sidney Homer, 80; Cyril Scott, 80; Rakhmaninov, 77; Oscar Posa, 70, and Edward MacDowell, 42.

One may ask pianists why they consistently avoid Chopin's greatly talented contemporary, Charles Morhange, alias Alkan, whose very remarkable etudes, preludes and sonatas have fallen almost completely into desuetude. One my inquire why they pass by the interesting barcarolles, nocturnes and impromptus of Gabriel Faure; why they play only two or three of Medtner's 31 charming "Maerchen," and seem to be unaware that he wrote 12 sonatas and three cycles of "Forgotten Motives."

He may not know it yet himself, but Joe Marsala brings his clarinet to Washington as he might bring a lance. There has been built about the local night clubs a long tradition against good swing bands; and for the next fortnight, Little Sir Joe will have to wield his long black stick in uncommon style if he wants to beat the jinx.

It should be a swell joust. I, for one, have good hopes that Marsala won't be another Don Quixote. If anyone can successfully challenge the situation, Joe can. After all, it was he who did the impossible by staying something like three years at the same place (Hickory House) on swingland's Fifty-second street in New York City. Other clubs on that famous Swing Row, have worked pretty much on a here-today-gone-tomorrow basis, but not Marsala.

Marsala is one of the real figures in American jazz. He hasn't enjoyed the success of other fine leaders like Glenn Miller or Shaw or Goodman because his music isn't built to appeal so directly to a large part of the public. His group is a jam band, pure and simple, rather than a sophisticated swing unit like those of Miller, Shaw and Goodman. I'm not implying that Marsala's kind of jazz is better than Goodman's or vice versa. But I will say that jaded ears, a little tired of the smartly arranged orchestrations of the big name bands, will get a lift from the wilder, more primitive catch-as-catch-can technique of Marsala's unit. The music of Marsala and his Chicagoans is that of musicians enjoying themselves in a little session after hours. It is unpredictable; it is incoherent to the unsympathetic; but it is inspired and throbbing with life when the boys are feeling right.

It isn't that Marsala can't commercialize his stuff when he wants to (let's hope he doesn't). It was he, for example, who wrote that ickie tune, "Little Sir Echo." And his swing—even when unadulterated—can be pretty, too. That amazing young woman, Adele Girard, can give a delicate touch to anything with her swinging harp—of all things.

Marsala's records are, unfortunately, few and far between. I recommend "Jim Jam Stomp" (Vocalion 4116) under his own name and the still older coupling, "Farewell Blues" and "Swingin' On The Famous Door" (Decca 737) by the Delta Four, featuring Marsala, Trumpeter Roy Eldridge, Carmen Mastren and Sid Weiss.

Here's a little more incidental information, continued from last week, about the Glen Gray orchestra, in town this week for the Harvest Moon Ball:

The band got its name, Casa Loma, from a Canadian club that was built for the advent of the Prince of Wales and which would have given the band its first job. The place never opened and the band, with ironic inspiration, annexed the club's name.

The Casa Loma orchestra was the first co-operatively owned band on record. That is, the band is owned by the musicians collectively and Gray is simply president of the corporation. The Bob Crosby and Woody Herman orchestras, among others, have since followed in the steps of the Casa Lomans.

The orchestra is the oldest intact band of any importance in existence, with the exception of Duke Ellington's.

Six foot-four inch Gray, handsomest of all bandleaders, is nickname "Spike," but I also found his name listed on old records as "Knoblauch." Until 1927, he did not "front" the band but was satisfied with sitting in the sax section with the rest of the smaller fry.

Back in 1930, Gray's was the outstanding swing band with his "Casa Loma Stomp" and "White Jazz." In 1931, a poll in Metronome magazine placed him second among swing bands, seventh among sweet. The latest Metronome poll placed

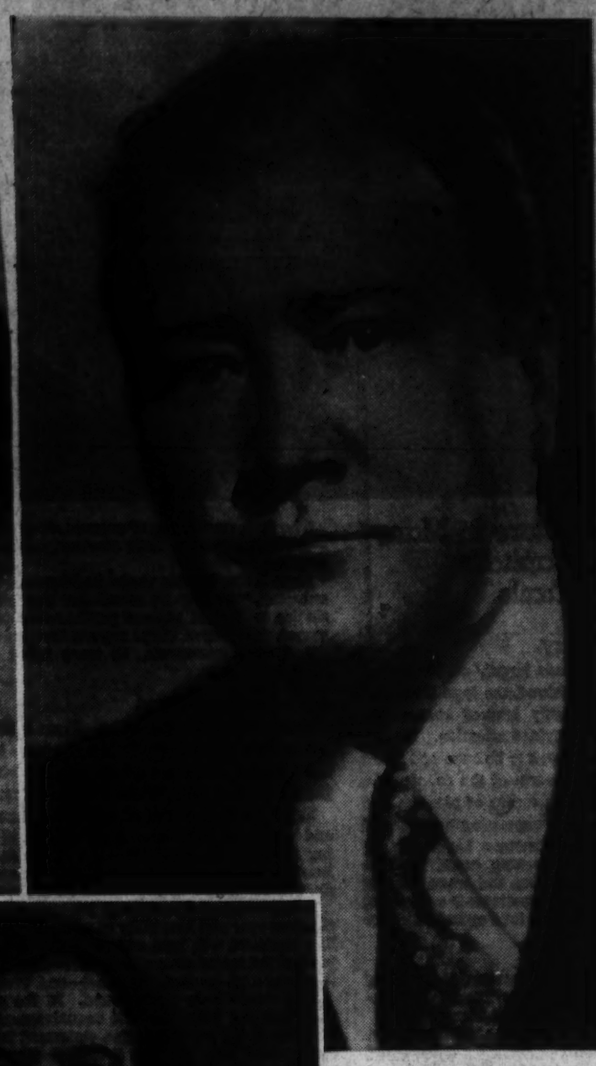
October Ushers In Music Season



Thomas Will Sing Here October 15

A fortnight hence Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey will start her season's schedule of 17 attractions by presenting John Charles Thomas, American barytone of the Metropolitan Opera, in a Constitution Hall recital on Sunday afternoon, October 15, at 4 o'clock. In addition to his operatic work this winter, Mr. Thomas has a large number of recitals in Town Hall, New York, devoting one program each to American, French, German, Italian and English songs.

On October 22 Robert Virovai, the sensational 18-year-old Yugoslav violinist, will make his first appearance in Constitution Hall. Other attractions in Mrs. Dorsey's first Sunday series are the Mozart Boys' Choir of Vienna, January 14; Mischa Levitski, pianist, February 11, and Nelson Eddy, barytone, March 31.

In the second Sunday series will be heard Sergi Rakhmaninov, pianist, November 12; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, November 26; the Don Cossack Chorus, December 10; Helen Jepson, soprano, February 25; Bidu Sayao, soprano, and Igor Gorin, barytone, March 10, and Richard Crooks, tenor, April 7.

Fritz Kreisler will play in Mrs. Dorsey's evening series on December 5, and will be followed by Kirsten Flagstad on January 23, Lily Pons on February 6, Lawrence Tibbett on March 5 and Vladimir Horovitz on April 9.

Reservations for any series can be made at Mrs. Dorsey's Concert Bureau in Droop's Music Store, 1300 G street, and single tickets for the Thomas recital will be available next Thursday morning.

Kreisler Soloist October 24

Under the direction of Eugene Ormandy, the Philadelphia Orchestra will begin its series of five Washington concerts in Constitution Hall on Tuesday evening, October 24, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The major work on the program is Skryabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem."

Leopold Stokowski will conduct the second concert on November 28, and Mr. Ormandy will direct the remainder of the concerts on January 2 (Yehudi Menuhin, soloist), February 27 (Arthur Rubinstein, soloist) and April 2. The personnel of the orchestra has not been affected by the European war, as every member is either a native or a naturalized American citizen. Marcel Tabuteau, solo oboe, was delayed in France a few days before he secured passage on the Ile de France. Albin Hase and Heinrich Wiemann, double bass players, were in Berlin when war was declared, and made their way back through Sweden.

Subscriptions for the five concerts can still be obtained from the new resident managers, Constance Albright Snow and Helen Fetter Cook, who maintain an office in Jordan's Piano Store, 1239 G street. Tickets for the first concert go on sale Monday, October 9.

Symphony to Present New Spier Composition

Four weeks before the opening of the National Symphony Orchestra's ninth season on October 29, in Constitution Hall, Hans Kindler discloses some of the novelties which he will introduce. One is a new work, "Seven Visions," by the resident composer, LaSalle Spier, who will be for the second time honored by the premiere of an orchestra composition in Washington. Admirers of another resident composer, Mary Howe, will be pleased to know that her "Castellana" concerto for two pianos, which was given its premiere here by Dr. Kindler several seasons ago, will be repeated on November 8 with Pierre Luboschutz and Genia Nemenov as soloists.

Scheduled to be given their first performances here by the National Symphony Orchestra are Olivier Messiaen's "Les Offrandes Oublices," Karol Rathaus' "Uriel Acosta" and Guenther Raphael's "Smetana Suite," based on dances by the Czech composer of "The Bartered Bride." Messiaen, who was born in Avignon,

John Charles Thomas (above) will be presented by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey in recital on Sunday afternoon, October 15, in Constitution Hall. Ruth Altman (left above) is leading soprano in the Children's Hospital benefit performances of Gilbert and Sullivan operas to be given October 12 and 13 in the same auditorium. Irene Lerch, pianist (right), opens the Roosevelt Hotel musicales at 9:30 this evening

Music Notes

The Emery Studios resumed activities September 15 with the staff consisting of Dorothy Emery, Willa Semple, Ione Hoffman and Jessamine Hartman, pianists, and Herman Hoffman, violinist. A faculty recital will be given the last week of this month.

Following its custom of producing one standard oratorio each season, the Mount Vernon Chorus of 70 voices will present Haydn's "The Seasons" next spring. Rehearsals will begin on Friday evening under the direction of Deane Shure, who invites the participation of all resident singers who have ever taken part in this oratorio. They are asked to report at 8 o'clock, entering the church on the Massachusetts avenue side.

Florenz Hinz, tenor with the Columbia Light Opera Company, who has recently returned from a tour with the New York Municipal Light Opera Company, is assisting Max Fichandler, director of the Gilbert and Sullivan productions, in Constitution Hall tomorrow and Tuesday evenings.

McCall Lanham, barytone, and his artist pupil, Paul Troll, barytone, will give a recital tonight at 8:30 in the Chevy Chase School.

Dr. H. S. Simon, musicologist, who is residing here as a visiting professor, has consented to give a series of ten weekly lectures on "The Saga of Music" at the Washington College of Music, beginning Thursday evening, October 19, at 8 o'clock.

Caroline F. Rabe, president of the Lovette Choral Club, announces that the first meeting of the thirteenth season will be held tomorrow evening in the studio of the director, Eva Whitford Lovette, 1736 Connecticut avenue. New members and prospective members are invited to attend for discussion of plans and auditions.

The Nordica Mandolin and Guitar Orchestra will resume rehearsals Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock in the studio of the director, Walter T. Holt.

By Nelson B. Bell.

THE BY-LINE appearing at the top of this column this bright first morning in October—please, Mr. Weather Man—by all the laws of equity and fair play, should be that of Charles Washburn.

Never having been privileged to view the Lunt's "outrageous production" of Master Will Shakespeare's "The Taming of the Shrew," but being fully aware of Mr. Washburn's accommodating spirit and literary accomplishments, we appealed to him, upon the occasion of his recent visit to Washington, for something authentic and concrete concerning the precise nature of the National's inaugural attraction, the present state of well-being of its stars, and their plans—if any—for the remainder of the 1939-40 season. Mr. Washburn's well ventilated and breezy response was so comprehensive a compliance with our greedy request that we give it you en toto.

The next voice you will hear will be that of Mr. Washburn reciting these words:

New Season Will Start With a Laugh

ALFRED LUNT AND LYNN FONTANNE take over the National Theater tomorrow night in their own undiluted and highly augmented production of William Shakespeare's "The Taming Of The Shrew." The new season is to start with a laugh, which, in these trying times, is just as it should be. Miss Fontanne in a hunting costume, chasing the hounds and a husband, and Mr. Lunt, with a long whip and a desire to conquer an unruly woman, give a rough idea of what to expect.

These masters of the lighter and more parlorish style of comedy have leaned completely backward for this occasion, leaving Mr. Anton Chekhov's "The Sea Gull" farther behind than a single year. Washington is more than likely to think the Lunts are two other people, especially those who were privileged to see them as thwarted souls in Mr. Chekhov's tale of disappointment. None of the characters in this 1939 "Shrew" is suppressed with heartaches. Roughhouse isn't a nice word for it, but that is what it amounts to. If nobody gets hurt during the week it will be something for the records.

Yesterday, the Lunts arrived in town and all last night and for the greater part of today they will leap the hurdles in preparation for what really amounts to a premiere tomorrow night. While this play was done in the years of 1934-35, it is quite a bit refurbished for the 1939 trade.

Miss Fontanne now makes her entrance as a huntress, waving aside the "prop" hounds and the "prop" victims of her two-gun prowess. A Shakespeare cow girl! That's brand new and no mistaking. A fightin' gal, men, and something for Mr. Lunt to subdue. And, as you know, that's the plot of the piece: A man's battle to dominate a rip-snorting, biff-banging, two-fisted mate.

To give all this a musical comedy note, Herbert Kingsley has written a score and some songs. The musicians are to be concealed somewhere back of the scenery because Mr. Lunt, kindly soul, doesn't want them to get hurt. Four years ago, he recalls, he clipped a second violinist across the beezer with his whip—and that mustn't happen again. In these days even a star cannot take chances with offending or bruising a member of the union.

The Stylists Finally Overtake Miss Fontanne

THE COSTUMES, too, are up to the minute. Miss Fontanne, after dismissing her wild-western garb of the first scene, takes to the latest in wasp-lined waist and hips. She introduced this style of gown in the first performances of "The Shrew," but it has taken four years for the fashionists to catch up with her idea of "what the woman should wear."

In the original cast were Richard Whorf, as Christopher Sly, the bum in the box; Sydney Greenstreet, as Baptista, and Edith King, as the widow. They are back in their old roles. Others listed in important assignments are Albert Carroll, Francis Compton, S. Thomas Gomez (he was here last season with the Lunts), Fay Baker and what the paid ads call "the greatest assortment of acrobats, midgets, hounds and horses ever assembled."

As for the future, the Lunts just don't know. Miss Fontanne has made it clear to all reporters that she and Alfred never announce plays in which they are interested. There are many plays they'd like to do, but they keep mum on the subject.

The current tour is quite up in the air as these words are written. From Washington the company goes to Madison, Wis., which is something of a long jump. But there is a new theater at the University of Wisconsin and Alfred, you know, was born in the neighboring Milwaukee. He has a farm up the road at Genesee Depot, in the same State—and he is something of the sentimentalist. So, the show moves across the land to open a new college auditorium on home grounds.

After Madison, comes Milwaukee and then a week of one-nighters through Iowa, into Omaha and then back to St. Louis for a week. Originally, the company planned to return to Baltimore and then into New York with a new play. But the new play is being held up, due to the sudden death of Sidney Howard. It seems there is a new Lunt play, but the dramatist is pledged to help out on what amounts to an unfinished Howard opus. A delay in their show is certain. Thus nobody knows.

Miss Fontanne, clinging to her policy of not talking about what the couple have in store, says she has no announcement to make. But it is known that the celebrated pair will get into a new comedy just as soon as the late Sidney Howard play is "fixed" by the dramatist who is working on their vehicle. That's that.

Present Tour May Extend to West Coast

THERE IS A ROUTE to the coast for "The Taming Of The Shrew" all penciled in, a route that would bring them back into the East about the first of the year. Hence it may be surmised that they expect to have their next offering ready about that time.

Both are in fine spirits. Alfred has fully recovered from an arthritic ailment and Lynn, in the language of a movie reviewer, "never looked lovelier."

"The Shrew" is a lark for them, fun for the audience and fun for the players. It is what is known in the trade as a "heavy show," needing two 70-foot baggage cars to handle the scenery and there is a cast of 40.

This means it takes two sleepers and two baggage cars to travel, which, of course, means considerable cost. However, the Theater Guild and John C. Wilson, who present the play, do not seem to mind. Yet the enterprise needs between $18,000 and $20,000 per week, depending on the railroad movements, and this isn't shells. There is a definite Lunt following everywhere, so nobody thinks of the operating items.

Last season the entourage with three plays, "The Sea Gull," "Amphitryon 38" and "Idiot's Delight," carried five baggage cars. Everything that was seen in New York was seen on tour, which, any way one looks at it, built up a tremendous prestige for the Lunts and for the Theater Guild. And the profits, despite the expense, were most handsome.

Well, the Washington season is about to open. And with the Lunts in a funny play. As the transfer man, hauling the scenery, so aptly put it: "Even the scenery is comical. I'm taking the little woman and the kids. I want to cheer 'em up."

A little of cheering is always a good idea and the right step in any man's theater. While the Lunts keep cheerful the stage hasn't a worry in the world—nor has the audience.

Nor will the dramatic editors have, either, if his associates in the craft will magnanimously perpetuate Mr. Washburn's willingness to fill gratuitously the yawning weekly spaces they are articled to occupy with Sabbath sermons that somehow always seem to come a little harder than this one has!

The Town Crier, Plus Whiskers, Reaches Stage

Monty Woolley Starred In New Hart-Kaufman 'Biographical' Comedy

By Irving Drutman.

It is a secret open to any one within eyeshot of the recent drama pages that the new Moss Hart-George S. Kaufman comedy, "The Man Who Came to Dinner," opening October 10 at the Music Box, New York, has for its leading character a fabled raconteur, wit, essayist, lecturer, book critic, drama critic, radio commentator, sometime thespian, anthologist, playwright and ghoul—one Alexander Woollcott by name.

It is even known that the authors, past masters at the art of libeling their friends, wrote the play especially for Mr. W., and that he declined the role at the last minute to go on a barnstorming lecture tour (where he can play himself as written by himself rather than by a couple of other fellows).

Casting a Problem

Faced with the problem of finding an Equity member who could convincingly drip treacle and poison for two hours a performance, Hart and Kaufman retired in a lather to Sam H. Harris' office and went over the list of possibilities. What was needed was someone with at least as much personality—to employ a euphemism—as the flibbetijibbet who inspired the play. The part was offered to Robert Morley, but he did not think it suited him. Adolph Menjou had the contract almost signed, then backed out. Someone at that point feebly suggested that Monty Woolley might be sensational.

"Why, of course," shouted Hart, and rushed to the telephone to call Woolley, then in Hollywood.

"Monty, can you come to New York right away for the leading role in my new play?" he asked.

"Aw, you're kidding," said Woolley.

"No, I'm not," said Hart.

"It's a practical joke," protested Woolley.

"Now, listen." . . . said Hart.

Woolley has the job.

Insufferably Cozy

And it's no easy job. As Sheridan Whiteside he is on stage for all but six minutes of the action, insulting, bribing, cajoling and making himself generally obnoxious. The role is a meaty one, and Woolley plays it with great gusto. As he was saying recently, "I'm very happy in it. It's a part Richard Mansfield would have given his eye-teeth for."

Since the glitter set to which Woolley belongs overlaps that of Mr. Woollcott, the atmosphere on stage is almost insufferably cozy.

Hedda Hopper

Contemplates the Masculinity of Male Dancers

Hollywood, Calif., Sept. 30.—The other day during our hottest season, I watched Fred Astaire and George Murphy doing an intricate dance sequence for "Broadway Melody of 1940." The immaculate Astaire was pretty wilted. But George's stiff bosom was still stiff. And I wondered why. He had left that cardboard, which is put in by the laundry, next to his skin and that took the beating and not the shirt. And I thought of the conversation I had overheard a week or so before about how any he-man can take up the career of dancing. Well, you'd have to be a trained athlete to take the punishment those boys took the other day.

HOPPER

And even though they saw it on the screen, there are carping critics who don't believe Fred Astaire did that golfing routine they saw him do in "Shall We Dance." Real golfers said it couldn't be done. But only a man whose muscles were as delicately tuned as the spring of a watch could have done it. Yes, Fred did it. Of course you all know Fred's history very well.

But I wonder if you know what made George Murphy a dancer? T'was nothing more than a cable breaking on one of those funny little cars used to lower coal miners into shafts back in Pennsylvania. And if the ramshackle elevator hadn't landed a mess of splinters some 40 feet below, chances are George would still be digging black diamonds rather than being able to buy the finest white ones to adorn his pretty wife.

Married a Dancer

After that accident they hauled a slightly mashed Mr. Murphy up to the surface. And after removing a ton, more or less, of loose anthracite, whisked him off to the hospital. Where six weeks on his back convinced him that life underground was pretty bleak anyhow. Even though he had studied mining engineering at Yale.

About a baker's dozen years ago he met and married Juliette Johnson, a dancer, who persuaded George that his notion about guys who danced for a living was all wrong. They were he-men, had stamina and how! His natural grace, coupled with his athletic ability, made him a swell dancing partner. As a team the Murphys were the pets of Broadway, and then danced their way West. And a few years ago Sam Goldwyn arranged a screen test for a girl who knew she was going to be the sensation of the screen world. She was so certain of it, that she talked George into playing straight in that test. He did it—you guessed it.

They forgot all about her, and Hoofer Murphy was signed on the dotted line.

Even though George played a grand part in "Letter of Introduction" with Charlie McCarthy, he considers the part he's doing in "Broadway Melody" his best to date. The story's based on rather a cute idea. Astaire and Murphy are male hosts to a dime-a-dance-hall. Would not you love to run into a couple of guys like that, if you ever had a dime for a dance? Finally the big time beckons and Murphy turns out to be a heel—of course until the very last reel.

A Grand Finale

And they do a finale to one of my favorite tunes, Cole Porter's "Begin the Beguine," with Eleanor Powell and the two of them doing the grandest routine I've ever seen to date.

"Don't Monkey With Old Broadway" sounds a little reminiscent of all the Broadway melodies.

It always amuses me when they do a song about dear old Broadway. For no showman, not even the great Ziegfeld himself (and he was the most extravagant), ever poured on the honey and molasses of extravaganza that our movie moguls indulge in. I think Broadway created more stars, because practically every chorus girl Ziegie ever had, has been, at one time or another a star in the cinema. But when you hear them talking about their fame, they don't mention the fact that they were chorus girls. Why, you'd think most of them were born with gold coaches, I mean Rolls-Royces.

But you'll get a kick out of Fred Astaire delivering a swift kick to where it hurts the most on George. Director Norman McLeod had anything but a chivalrous sense of humor. He wanted the shot from every angle. He got it, and they had 40 takes. No Murphy isn't riding horseback these days. But Astaire and McLeod are ducking.

Puglistic President

If you ask George who his favorite dancing partner is, he'll give you a disdainful squint and say: "My wife, of course." And with her, it's ditto. They both swim, golf and tennis. George is president of our Westside Tennis Club. And quite handy with his fists, as one of our snooty visitors discovered last year when he tried to crash a party there.

Star's Early Stage Work Won Him the Palm

Philip Merivale Began Career as Exalted Sort of 'Super'

There's a great difference between palm-waving and spear-carrying—a very great one, and Philip Merivale will vault into a lengthy discussion of the subject at the drop of an "h."

Not that Mr. Merivale is very concerned about it at present—now he is much more interested in "Ladies and Gentlemen," the new play by Charles MacArthur and Ben Hecht, in which he is costarred with Helen Hayes, and which will open a one-week engagement at the National Theater on Monday evening, October 9—but he made his debut on the London stage with a palm in his hand, and has never forgotten it.

At that time, spears were for ordinary extras, while palms, which required more finesse, were for their superiors.

Mr. Merivale is still a little proud about the whole affair.

Soon Graduated

Soon after his theatrical baptism, Mr. Merivale graduated to speaking parts, and began giving a series of shrewd, vigorous performances as Cassio in "Othello," Sir Joseph Surface in "The School for Scandal," Mercutio in "Romeo and Juliet," and Thomas Doughty in "Drake," a production that had Lyn Harding playing the router of the Spanish armada.

Established as an actor of repute in England, Mr. Merivale was signed by Mrs. Patrick Campbell to come to America with her, to play Prof. Henry Higgins to her Eliza Doolittle in "Pygmalion."

Since that time he has confined most of his theatrical appearances to this side of the Atlantic.

Played Many Parts

Some of his roles? He played Will Shakespeare in a play of that name by Clemence Dane; was eloquently Gallic as Maurice Sorbier in "Grounds for Divorce," an Ina Claire vehicle that flourished at the Empire some 15 years ago, and was seen at Hotspur in the Players Club revival of "Henry IV," which had Otis Skinner as Falstaff.

In the past decade he has been involved in such successes as "The Road to Rome," in which he played Hannibal, opposite Jane Cowl; "Death Takes a Holiday," in which he created the role of Prince Sirki; "Cynara," Mary of Scotland," when he was Bothwell to Helen Hayes, Mary, and "Valley Forge," when he walked the snow-swept trails of Valley Forge as Gen. George Washington. He made his most recent appearance in Washington and on Broadway in the Theater Guild's "Call it a Day."

Mourns Loss of Two Great Cultural Influences

It was amid the alarums and excursions of war-time Paris that I heard of the death of Lawrence Gilman and Sidney Howard, and for the moment the European tragedy seemed strangely remote.

I knew the music critic far better than I did the playwright, but in both cases there was a sense of personal deprivation added to the feeling of the loss of two exceptional talents, a loss to the culture of what is left of the civilized world that is sharp and unmistakable.

Mr. Gilman was not only the most distinguished music critic of his time; he was, I believe, in learning, insight, sympathy, the eloquence and urbanity of his literary style and in general equipment the most distinguished practicing critic of any form of the arts in America.

Mr. Howard has never quite lived up to the promise of a few of his works, and he had a curious lack of respect for his craft, but in force, vitality, versatility and, above all, in the crusading zeal of his personality, he was one of the leaders, and he decidedly merited his position among the most influential of our dramatists.

A Man of Letters

Any one who had ever read any of Mr. Gilman's reviews—and his following among those who were not ardent music lovers but who read him for the grace of his literary style, the quality of his thought and the sapience of his observations was almost as great as it was among those who were music enthusiasts—knew of his great critical wisdom and his distinction as a general man of letters. But I shall remember him not only for his eloquence and his wisdom but also for his qualities as a man. He was, I think, the most complete gentleman I have ever known. His learning, which was great, was saved from any possible suggestion of pedantry by a delightful and unaffected strain of Rabelaisian humor, and his culture was given charm and warmth by his mellow wit. His sense of fun and his sense of dignity he carried with equal lightness, and it made him one of the most delightful of companions as well as one of the best of advisers. It is one of the great good fortunes of my days as a newspaper man that I have been able to work on the same paper with and in close proximity to Lawrence Gilman and Percy Hammond, two of the most distinguished figures in modern criticism.

Death Symbolic

The grotesque senselessness of the accident that killed Mr. Howard makes his death seem somehow symbolic of the fate of our times. It is only natural, too, that he should be, even in this respect, a sort of symbol of the fate of the artist in a crazy world, since, although he stubbornly refused to think of himself as an artist, he was always an active participant in the affairs of his craft and of the world.

As a fighting leader of the Dramatists' Guild, a skillful pioneer exposer of the machinations of the labor spy, a constant fighter for freedom of speech and an embattled liberal in the good causes of our time, he was always a striking and vital man of action, and even if he had been less successful as a playwright he would have been an influence in the American theater.

Perhaps, in truth, it was as a strong liberal force in his active life, rather than as the author of "Lucky Sam McCarver" and "Yellow Jack," that he was most important to the drama.

Wrote Vigorously

If it is "Lucky Sam McCarver" and "Yellow Jack" that I mention, rather than such successes as "They Knew What They Wanted" and "Dodsworth," it is because I am convinced that the two former are Mr. Howard's most striking works. Neither was a popular success and neither was completely realized in the writing, but both were dramas of integrity, originality, force and genuine creative imagination, and they stand high among the plays of the generation.

"They Knew What They Wanted" and "Dodsworth"—the former of which is to be revived next week—were, at least at the time when they were written, effective theatrical works, but they lacked the freshness and the imagination that Mr. Howe-

Gene Fowler quit Fire Island, and rushed back to Hollywood, to do the next Gable-Loy film . . . Mort Lewis has been paid each time he's appeared on four guest-star programs this year. But his own program, "If I Had the Chance," which has had more guest stars than any of the others, pays nothing to the participants . . . Administration friends wonder why F. For five years Edward Duryea Dowling, the Shubert director, has been publicizing his middle name, so that he would not be confused with Edward Dowling, the actor . . . Bea Lillie, who is seldom seen in New York without him, joined in stressing the "Duryea" part of his name, and presented to him a watch chain whose gold links were letters spelling out, in full, "Edward Duryea Dowling" . . . Last week Eddie sent a cable to Bea. He was warned that the British censors demanded a full-name signature—at 22 cents a word . . . "What is your signature?" Eddie was asked . . . At 22 cents a word, he signed it: "Edward Dowling."

The late Carl Laemmle, sr., brought his son to Arthur Caesar and said: "He's just about to start in the movie business today. Teach him all you've learned" . . . Caesar, then a novice himself, took Junior Laemmle aside and instructed: "In your job you'll go to a lot of previews. When they ask you what you think of the picture, look smart, tell 'em it'll do great in the sticks—and then run like hell."

Michael Todd, the promoter who produced "The Hot Mikado," sent his family to Bermuda and then joined them . . . His young son confessed that while he was out in the boat a swimmer had tried to climb in—but the boy shooed him away . . . "Son, that's bad," Todd berated. "You'll never be a promoter that way" . . . That afternoon an invitation came from the swimmer who had been rebuffed, and who didn't mind it. The invitation was from Mr. Vincent Astor.

George Jessel was toastmaster at a dinner where Louis B. Mayer was scheduled to speak. A telegram, intended for Mayer, was delivered to Jessel. It was from Mervyn LeRoy, the message was: "Busy shooting new story. Unable to attend, but I listened to the broadcast. You outdid yourself and were terrific—Mervyn" . . . Mayer hadn't made his speech as yet—and Jessel gave the wire to him . . . The producer read it, and signed: "Now isn't that sweet of him."

Don't forget—there'll be three shows a day and, atfer all, it'll be tough to get the spirits to work with him that often" . . . "Never mind Dunninger," the agent was told, "For that kind of dough, see if you can get me the spirits."

Louella O. Parsons'

Close-Ups and Long-Shots of the Motion Picture Scene

Hollywood, Sept. 30.—The American public is the movies' No. 1 audience. It has taken a war in Europe to make Hollywood wake up to that fact and I hope they will never forget it again. I am delighted that this year the fans all over the country are going to have a chance to meet the stars face to face.

LOUELLA PARSONS

Our glamor girls, our handsome heroes and even lesser lights have awakened to the fact that the American audiences have made their success possible and so the biggest of them are agreeing to go on personal appearance tours.

I feel it was a mistake, in the first place, that the personal appearance tours, which flourished so extensively years ago, were ever allowed to become passe. It got to the point where only a star on his last legs would consent to go out and meet his public. Popular stars on the top of the heap were insulted at the mere suggestion of "barnstorming" through the country.

But now it is imperative to woo back the American fans as they were never wooed before. I do not want to leave the impression that it is a purely mercenary motive that is instigating so many of these present tours—and others coming up. I've never talked to anyone more enthused about meeting his public face to face than George Raft, who told me:

"The studio won't have to bother to send me on tour. Whether they think of it or not, I am going to try to go out at least twice a year, greeting fans all over the country—talking to small and big town theater owners and meeting all the people I can. It isn't always necessary to stand upon a stage to be on tour. I've shaken more hands in hotel lobbies and I feel this close contact has done me more good in getting a sane slant on my job than a whole speech from a theater stage."

Jeanette MacDonald is another of the top-notchers who opened Hollywood's eyes to the value of going on "the road." Wise, indeed, was Jeanette when she scorned the adulation of mobs in the big towns and went to the smaller places, meeting and talking with sorority girls, granting interviews to college papers and actually exchanging recipes with the housewives she met.

With Jeanette, George Raft and Nelson Eddy blazing the trail, it is no surprise to learn of dozens of others who are planning to follow in their footsteps and meet Joe Public and his wife on their own front porch.

Martha Raye is leaving for a three-month jaunt that will take her almost over the entire United States. Martha is a friendly girl, who is sure to win lots of friends for herself and Hollywood and, in addition, she can really do something on the stage which should make the exhibitors happy when they count the sheckels.

Joe E. Brown is another who is sure to break box-office records wherever he appears. There has been so much written about Ann Sheridan's "oomph" tour, via special car, that I am sure I do not have to tell you much more about that. Lola Lane, the "Dead End Kids, Jimmy Durante, John Boles, William Holden, Edmund Lowe, Leo Carrillo, Edgar Kennedy and others will soon take to the "open road."

It is impossible to overestimate the good will and interest stirred up by a tour such as Jesse Lasky sponsored when his "Gateway to Hollywood" troupes went questing in search of talent. I have said it before—but let me say it again—that fan interest can be stimulated only by Hollywood's interest in the fan. The movies can no longer play aloof and ritzy to the people who make their success possible, and in all the years I've been reporting news of this town, I am happy to say that Hollywood has never been more conscious of its obligations to our American public than it is today.

Carole Longs For 'Wardrobe' In Next Picture

Gay Comedienne Now Demure Housewife Doing Serious Drama

Hollywood, Sept. 30 (AP).—Moviedom's dizzy dame has turned into a demurely dutiful farm wife, but Carole Lombard still has that old twinkle in her eye.

Screwball sensation of the "My Man Godfrey" comedy cycle, now appearing in serious roles, she remains a wag at heart.

The other day, for example, in the midst of the heat wave, she ordered up a 100-pound cake of ice and sat on it between set calls. When she was working she turned it over to extras to "keep it warm" for her.

Carole, still receiving compliments for her serious work in her two most recent pictures, "Made for Each Other" and "In Name Only," currently is playing a starkly dramatic role with Brian Aherne in "Vigil in the Night."

Carole, in case you didn't know, for some six months now has been the wife of Clark Gable.

They live on a ranch miles from the studio, drive to work together—to separate studios—every day, and are very happy.

Clark spends his leisure hours pitching hay or puttering around the barn. Carole, turned domestic, busies herself about the farmhouse, but occasionally helps her husband milk a cow or rustle up an egg.

Clark is doing quite well in the cinema, thank you, says Carole. She just saw him in a sneak preview of "Gone With the Wind," and she says the picture is terrific.

Maybe they'll be saying "terrific" about Carole one of these days in "Vigil in the Night." From a new novel by A. J. Cronin, it paints England's nursing profession in the same uncompromising colors "The Citadel" did for British medicine.

A nurse in the picture, Carole wears the unromantic uniforms of the profession, complete with cotton stockings, and emotes within a severe hairdo.

Typical is a scene in the bare dormitory room, with iron bedsteads, which Carole occupies with Roommate Brenda Forbes. A supervisor drops in and Brenda, who has been sneaking a smoke, pops the lighted cigarettes into her mouth.

"Brenda's done that 20 times in rehearsals," marvels Carole, "and hasn't burned her mouth once."

Carole abandoned haywire comedy, but not for long, not by design and not for fun.

She has no especial preference for drama—"if it's a good part in a good story, that's all that counts."

Carole has no plans for her next picture, but would like to do a drawing-room comedy—as a clothes-horse.

The Town Crier

All the Big Ones are there, either in effigy or stuffed into the dialogue. Noel Coward appears in the person of John Hoysradt. Harpo Marx (David Burns) bounces through the third act in company with the surrealist Salvator Dali, and a leading actress who shall be nameless is subjected to what is known as the works. Mentioned in passing are Admiral Byrd, Sam Goldwyn, Lady Astor, William Beebe, Darryl Zanuck, Katharine Cornell, Gertrude Stein, Lawrence Tibbett, Somerset Maugham, Lord and Lady Cunard, Ethel Barrymore, Thornton Wilder, Anthony Eden, David Selznick, Rebecca West, Mrs. Vincent Astor, G. H. Welles and Christmas (which, the ingenue carefully explains, Whiteside also considers his personal property). All these celebrities are known either to the authors, to Mr. Woollcott or to Mr. Woolley, making it just one big happy family.

Woolley knows his way around in the conventions of eccentricity. Like the petulant pixie he portrays, he can be snide at the drop of a hat, and his knowledge of withering mots juste is comprehensive. But so sunny is his smile, so infectious his gayety that he has never caused the "Welcome" to be rubbed off a friend's doormat, and his cronies keep an eternal light burning in the window for him.

In fact, no one knew he'd been present. He hadn't except for a few seconds.

Not long ago he trained Lee Ramage, coast heavyweight, for an important match. And stood up with the professional for several training rounds a day. He said it helped his dancing. Guess it did.

George invented a liniment for the relief of Charlie horse, put it on the market and still makes a couple of dollars a year from it. But all this pugilistic prowess is probably a throwback to his famous father, Mike Murphy, Olympic coach and long-time trainer of athletes at the University of Pennsylvania.

Open-Air

Another of the proven pictures of the past few years is brought back to the Open-Air Theater, for four days starting today and ending Wednesday. The title of this popular hit is "My Man Godfrey" starring William Powell and Carole Lombard.

The story, briefly told, portrays Miss Lombard as a debutante who in order to win a bet plucks William Powell from the city dump and gives him a job as her butler over the objections of her family. William Powell finds that he is employed by a family in which the mother is slightly batty (Alice Brady): one of the daughters, Gail Patrick, has a cruel streak; Carole Lombard is nice but dumb and the father, Eugene Pallette, is a decent sort but hasn't a chance with his goofy relatives. Laugh after laugh is provided by the excellent portrayal of this exceptionally funny story by this fine cast.

The Open-Air Theater will remain in operation every evening, rain or moon, through November.

Engine for 'Ruler'

One of the most complicated mechanical sets in screen history today is the ship's engine room built for the new Frank Lloyd production, "Ruler of the Seas," with Douglas Fairbanks, jr., Margaret Lockwood and Will Fyffe. It contains a full-sized, working reproduction of an 1838 marine steam engine.

Richard Watts

ard and brought to his two best plays, and I think there is, by comparison, something machine-made and undistinguished about them. But they did have the vitality that almost everything he wrote possessed as the mark of his authorship.

Unfortunately, his last play, "The Ghost of Yankee Doodle," was one of the few that lacked even this completely. At the time it was written liberalism and pacifism were in such a plight that even Mr. Howard couldn't give them proper stage vigor.

There were times when Mr. Howard grew melancholy about the theater, and then he would either dart off to Hollywood or would write something aboout the incipient doom of the stage that was filled with unbecoming gloom.

I remember that in a symposium of the photoplay, the name of which I have happily forgotten, published a couple of years ago, he came pretty close to predicting the doom of the drama and its tranfiguration into the cinema of the future. It made me pretty made at the moment, and I replied to it violently in a book review that was, fortunately, never printed. I am glad that it wasn't because I realize now that the piece merely showed Mr. Howard in a mood of transitory pessimism.

Even if he did hold the position of the playwright in ill-judged disrepute, he was always a courageous battler for the theater, and his devotion to it was whole-souled. The fact that he kept coming back to it so insistently and that he was always trying something new in the way of play material proved that the theater was an important artform to him and that playwrighing was in his blood, even though he was foolish enough to insist that the actor, rather than the dramatist, was the backbone of the drama.

Gayety

"Daughters of Eve" is the title of the new burlesque revue which will make its bow at the Gayety Theater this afternoon. Lovely Renee is the star of the extravaganza, which utilizes a company of established national favorites.

Louise Rogers heads the group of display artistes and Jean Lee is an added feature on the billing. The comedy is in the capable hands of Max Coleman, Lou Devine and Jess Madden and a large chorus of youthful dancers augments the principals.

Atlas

Hoot Gibson, favorite cowboy star of many an American boy, will appear in person on the stage of the Atlas Theater for three days, beginning with this afternoon's performance.

The film luminary will not only offer his own act, but also will serve as master of ceremonies for the stage revue, which will include comedy by Eddie "Nut" Kaplan and Georgie Kaye and songs and dances by the Ted Adair company. George Berg's Swing Band likewise will be on hand.

The double-feature screen bill includes James Cagney and George Raft in "Each Dawn I Die" and Laurel and Hardy in "Beau Hunks."

The Army of the Middle Atlantic Area is taking up where the Manassas war games left off. At Fort Meade, Md., beginning tomorrow, regular troops will spend a week adjusting the military cogs—infantry, cavalry, air and tank forces—into a high-powered, efficient war machine. Using the same tactical problem posed by the Polish invasion, "Blue" forces, composed of chiefly cavalry and infantry units, will defend themselves against the power and speed of a heavily mechanized "Black" army. Artillery and aviation will support both sides

Training in Finer Points Of Warfare

Field Exercises Will Teach All Service Arms to Work As Combat Team

By John G. Norris.

Regular Army troops of the Middle Atlantic area will follow up last month's Manassas war games with a week of "postgraduate" maneuvers beginning at Fort George G. Meade, Md., tomorrow.

Some 3,400 officers and men, practically all of the regulars of the Third Corps area, will concentrate at Meade for what is called "advanced field exercises," the training of troops in the finer points and better technique of warfare.

Recently ordered as a part of an expanded training program for the corps, the maneuvers primarily are designed to perfect the various arms of the service in working as a combat team. Normally, infantry, artillery, cavalry and the air force have little opportunity to operate together and develop the smooth technique demonstrated by the highly trained German and French armies. Up to now, units of the American Army have held combined maneuvers only once a year.

With the world at war, however, Maj. Gen. James Kelly Parsons, Third Corps Area commander, wants to bring his troops to as high degree of efficiency as possible—just in case—and will send them regularly into the field from now on for the larger-scale drills. Except for the winter months, it is planned to concentrate most of the corps for field training one week out of each month during the remainder of the fiscal year.

While the military problem to be faced by troops from Maryland and Virginia posts has not been prepared with that in mind, the line-up in next week's local mock war bears considerable resemblance to the real conflict just ending in Poland.

There, the Polish army, consisting principally of cavalry and infantry, faced a highly mechanized Reich war machine. The Poles did not have adequate antitank guns or other satisfactory defense against the German panzer divisions, and the tanks, supported by infantry, rolled through to a perfect demonstration of a blitzkreig.

Face "Problem" Like Poles

Brig. Gen. Maxwell Murray, commander of the Washington provisional brigade, who heads the "Blue Army" next week, will have cavalry and infantry, while the main striking force of the enemy "Black Army" will be composed of tanks and infantry. And in the problem, the "Blue" soldiers from Fort Myer and Arlington Cantonment, like the unfortunate Poles, will not have the latest anti-tank weapons.

However, the "Blues" are determined not to be pushed back like the Poles, and plan to utilize all manner of tank defense tactics to block the enemy. Besides their .50 caliber machine guns and old type .37 mm. anti-tank guns, they will prepare traps, spirals and all manner of prepared and improvised barriers against the lumbering caterpillars.

Both armies will have supporting artillery and aviation during the "war." Murray's force consists of the Twelfth Infantry from Arlington Cantonment and Fort Howard, Md., a two battalion regiment; the Third Cavalry from Fort Myer, a regiment less one squadron; the First battalion of the Sixteenth Field Artillery (less one battery) from Myer; and a detachment of the Third Observation Squadron from Langley Field. Washington provisional brigade headquarters here will be the "Blue Army" G. H. Q.

Col. Elliot to Lead "Blacks"

Opposing them will be a "Black Army" under Col. Charles B. Elliott, commander of the Thirty-fourth Infantry at Meade. His force consists of: Headquarters and headquarters company, Sixteenth Brigade, Thirty-fourth Infantry (less Third battalion), First battalion of the Sixty-sixth Infantry (tanks) with Company I attached, all of Fort Meade, and a truck-drawn battalion of the Sixth Field Artillery from Fort Hoyle, Md. Planes from the Third Observation Squadron will also be attached to the "Blacks."

Brig. Gen. C. A. Trott, Sixteenth Brigade Commander, will be director of the war games and act as chief umpire. General Parsons is expected to be present part of the time as an observer.

The concentraton will take place today and tomorrow, with all units occupying bivouac positions by Monday afternoon. During the whole maneuvers all troops will sleep in pup tents and be fed from rolling field kitchens. Special security, communication, supply and anti-aircraft defense problems will be carried out during the first day.

On Tuesday, commanders of the two armies will organize their staffs and carry on one-sided problems. Wednesday, these problems will continue, with both forces under directions to be ready to go into action anytime after 7 p. m.

During these two days, the troops will be intensively drilled in the technique of advancing under varied circumstances. Other exacting maneuvers of a more advanced nature than those attempted at Manassas will be carried on to thoroughly drill each unit in all types of movements and action. Here is the curriculum laid down for the Washington brigade during this period:

Formation and conduct of point, advance party, support, reserve and main body drills, involving use of connecting files and flank patrols.

Anti-tank and anti-aircraft formations and defense measures; march outposts; advancing through and around artillery fire.

Advancing through long range machine gun and rifle fire.

Taking cover from air attack, artillery fire and small arms fire.

Use of scouts, squad columns, infiltration.

Use of fire and movements.

Gets Under Way on Thursday

Wednesday night, both sides will advance to combat positions, and the "war" will get underway early on Thursday. The assumed situation is that war has been declared between two States which are separated by the Little Patuxent River. The army of "Blue," the nation west of the border, has attacked with the mission of capturing Fort Meade. Its force crosses Old Forge Bridge, but General Murray's advance guard meets a stronger force, drops back and then assumes the defensive on the west bank of Midway Branch and Rogue Harbor Branch. The battle then develops from there.

On Friday, the "Blue Army" takes the offensive and Col. Elliot's men attempt to hold them from capturing Meade.

Activities of The District National Guard

By Joseph D. Cooper.

District National Guard headquarters is buzzing with activity since Gen. Cox announced the distribution of the added strength of 552 enlisted men to the command. The 260th Coast Artillery, Antiaircraft, will add 465 men, giving that comparatively new regiment almost 1,200 men, just about the size of the entire local Guard last year. To the 121st Engineers will go 70 men, while to Company A, 372d Infantry (colored), will be added 17 men.

This allocation of strength appears to be based entirely upon need for men to handle the equipment of the units. The Coast Artillery regiment is almost an artillery brigade in itself, for its units do the work of quartermasters, engineers, signal corps and artillery. The shiny new antiaircraft guns and searchlights need men to operate them. The colored infantry company will not need to recruit men, for it has a long waiting list.

The sudden expansion program resulted in intense study of the architect's plans for the new armory. Guard officials are thankful that the increase came while the armory is still on paper only.

Gen. Cox has changed the meeting nights of his State Staff to Thursday throughout the month of October, so that his officers may be able to visit the Coast Artillery Armory at Maine and O streets southwest. The only exception will be that instead of a drill on October 12, there will be a review on the Mall in honor of the District Commissioners, other officials of the District Government, the Board of Trade and the Merchants and Manufacturers Association.

The band of the 121st Engineers, under the direction of Meyer Goldman, will give a concert at the Watergate today in connection with current Red Cross activities. On Thursday, a color detail from the Special Troops, composed of Staff Sergt. Garrett C. Rush, Staff Sergt. Maxwell E. Kaplan, Staff Sergt. Fred W. Jordan, Pvt. Charles A. Wilding and Pvt. Chester R. Fergusson, participated in the flag-raising detail at the District Building, for the Red Cross.

General jubilation should follow the news that Brig. Gen. Albert L. Cox has accepted the invitation of Maj. Gen. Milton A. Reckord to have all District troops, except the Coast Artillery, as guests of the Maryland National Guard at Camp Ritchie, Cascade, Md., next summer. In 1938 the 121st Engineers camped at Ritchie, but the Coast Artillery went to Fort Story, Va., and the 104th Quartermaster Regiment and the Special Troops went to Front Royal, Va., where they established their own camp. This year all of the personnel went to the Manassas maneuvers. The permanent, hot and cold water showers, permanent mess halls, cement base tents with cots, and beautiful, enclosed lake in which to swim all offer a tempting picture to the troops. The restriction against enlistment during the 60 days prior to camp has been rescinded by Gen. Cox.

Company team and individual pistol championship matches being held today, starting at 8 a. m., at Camp Simms, Congress Heights, D. C., are initiating the annual target matches of the District Guard. The musketry championship match will be held next Saturday at 1 p. m., and the company team and individual rifle matches will be held on Sunday at 8 a. m.

Maj. Just C. Jensen is executive officer, assisted by Capt. Hugh Everett, junior statistical officer, and Capt. James R. Quade, chief range officer. First Lieuts. H. W. Leath, J. D. Tanner, Henry M. Boudinot, W. D. Putnam and L. A. Jackson, Second Lieuts. A. G. Conlyn and M. A. Juten are range and pit officers. Subsistence will be furnished by the Quartermaster, and Government employes who have conflicts with their work will receive military leave certificates of duty performed.

Marine Corps Reserves

Marine Corps Reserve Service medals will be presented to eligible members of the Fifth Battalion USMC (O), on October 24 in the Hecht Parking Building. This medal is awarded to all officers and men who have attended four annual field training periods of not less than 14 days each, and have attended with an organized unit of the Reserve 80 per cent of all the scheduled drills each year for four consecutive years. In addition the fitness report of officers and the average service record markings of the men must be of such high standards as to indicate their military proficiency. This medal is one of the coveted medals of the Reservist.

The following officers and men will be awarded the medal: Lieut. Col. Harvey L. Miller, Maj. William W. Stickney, Capt. Justice M. Chambers, Capt. Ralph M. King, Capt. Charles B. Nerren, Capt. Otho L. Rogers, First Lieut. Robert E. Coper, jr., First Lieut. Alfred M. Marks, First Lieut. William R. Via, Second Lieut. Charles I. Britt, Marine Gunner Myron E. Thompson, sr., Sergt. Maj. Harry F. Volkman, Q. M. Sergt. James G. Neff, First Sergt. Donald J. Nevin, First Sergt. Dewey C. Graham, First Sergt. Harry W. Warner, Gunnery Sergt. Julius H. Lanham, Gunnery Sergt. Paul L. Lawson, Supply Sergt. David Bloom, Platoon Sergt. Walter W. White, Sergt. Clark H. Baldwin, Sergt. Karl H. Becker, Sergt Raymond J. Bogk, Sergt. Walter A. Johnson, Corpl. Roy E. Cole, Corpl. Oliver H. Crawford, Corpl. Woodrow H. Dillon, Corpl. Claude E. Kelley, Corpl. Earl L. Otey, and Corpl. George Playfair.

In addition, USMCR (O) medals will be presented to the following men, all of USNR (O) of the Fifth Battalion Medical Detachment: Chief pharmacist's mate Robert L. Jenkins; pharmacist, first class, Ira E. LaLonde; pharmacist third class, Frederick W. Vine; hospital apprentice, first class, William E. Davis and Ralph L. Rector, and hospital apprentice, second class, Francis X. Alexander.

In a message to all members of the Fifth Battalion, Lieut. Col. Harvey L. Miller, Battalion Commander, urged that every effort be made to recruit the battalion up to full strength. In recent weeks quite a few enlisted members of the battalion have asked for their discharges in order to enlist in the regular Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Coast Guard, thus leaving vacancies in the ranks of the Reserve Battalion which is subject to call as a unit.

The Fifth Battalion is composed of young men residing in the District and nearby Maryland and Virginia. Through the medium of this battalion the Marine Corps offers to residents of this section a splendid opportunity for learning the life of a Marine. No previous military experience is required.

Those Army and Navy Marriage Rules Again

By J. G. N.

Secretary of War Woodring wrote into Army regulations this week a flat prohibition against lieutenants marrying during their first year of commissioned service. The order, carrying out a law passed by Congress last session at Woodring's request, partially extends the age-old West Point rule against cadets acquiring a moustache, horse or wife, to Army officers appointed after July 1, 1942. They can grow a misplaced eye-brow or buy a Kentucky thorough-bred on their 125 bucks a month but not take unto themselves a wife. Or so the gruff War Department says.

We wonder how effective the ban will be. Judging from the way the rule has worked at West Point and Annapolis and in the Navy and Marine Corps, where a prohibition on young officer benedicts has existed for several years, Cupid will have its way. Every now and then a young Navy or Marine officer, or a cadet or midshipman is dismissed when it is discovered he has a wife. Usually it is hushed up, unless the individual is prominent or some ill-advised relative consults his Congressman and the spot-light of publicity is directed at the case. The Army career of "Red" Cagle, famous West Point football star, was terminated when it was discovered that he had had a wife during his last two years at West Point. Nearly every session of Congress at least one bill is introduced to reinstate some midshipman who was dismissed for disobeying the marriage rule. None has been successful.

Then there was the case of young Lieut. Douglas C. McDougal, jr., son of Maj. Gen. Douglas C. McDougal, Sr., U. S. M. C., who was discharged after the Senate Naval Committee discovered he was married. Victims of the newly established selection system in the corps were the cause of young McDougal's downfall. They complained to their Senators that his marriage—contrary to regulations—was common knowledge throughout the service, and that the Marine high command took no action against him. Gen. McDougal, then assistant Marine commandant, testified before the committee that he did not know his son was married. The committee, after hearing the facts, recommended that Lieut. McDougal be allowed to retain his commission despite his infringement of the regulations, but the Marine Corps dropped him from the rolls.

We hope we won't stir some gray-beards into action by this piece, but our young friends in the service tell us that for every discharge for marrying there are many who wed and don't tell, and then go on to brilliant careers in the Army and Navy. Only those caught red-handed, or where disappointed rivals take a spiteful revenge by writing to high authorities are out of luck, they declare. There's probably no truth in it, but there is a story running through the Army and Navy of the young girl attending the graduation exercises at West Point—or Annapolis as the case may be—with a youngster toddling along. As the diplomas were being handed out, the child is supposed to have called out—"there's my daddy now."

really got something. Even our own Jack and Charlie would be amused.

There are still some rare blossoms to be culled from the herbiage at Flushing Meadows. We have it on excellent authority that an out-of-towner last week was considerably perturbed by the goings-on at "Extasie," a midway diversion. "Extasie," for those who are yet uninitiated, is a mimed presentation of the Salome legend, done with a recorded accompaniment. This particular Fairgoer, who hailed from Tiffin, Ohio (so help us!), was particularly impressed with the decapitation of John the Baptist, over whom Salome goes quite nuts. The native from Tiffin came back a few days later with a friend, and just as Salome, after shedding her veils all over the throne room, bent down to buss the dead lips, the visitor emitted a low scream. "My God," she whispered, "they've killed the other one; they've killed the other one!" An attendant rushed up and escorted her gently out. Then he asked her what the hell. "The head!" murmured the lady from Tiffin. "It wasn't the same head as last week. What have you done?" If the attendant had been at all publicity conscious he would have told her that they used up three John the Baptists a day—and to take the matter to the police if she didn't like it. As it was, he only informed her that there were two prop heads and that sometimes they used one and sometimes another. She went away only half convinced.

Seasoned Timber

By Dorothy Canfield

When the Academy in Clifford, Vt., opened for its 117th year, Timothy Coulton Hulme had no way of knowing this year was to be very different. The routine of his tasks as principal, of Aunt Lavinia's phonograph playing, and of taking her to supper at Miss Peck's, were all about as usual. But at Miss Peck's Timothy met Susan Barney, the new third grade teacher, who was waiting table. His awareness of her was intensified one night when, after leading on old Mrs. Washburn whose talk-faucet everyone avoided, he saw Susan's eyes fixed on him. Later she followed him outdoors to try to say how fine she thought it that he had been kind to Mrs. Washburn. Knowing her had begun with the idea of analyzing the old lady as a bore, Timothy is truly disquieted and almost ashamed.

Chapter 8

APPALLED by these alarmist looks into the future, his mind ventured to propose to him that perhaps the best thing would be to say nothing, to keep his hand closed around the stolen purse since nobody knew about it. But it had gone too far, had strayed into territory forbidden to a mere mind. The awful word "dishonorable" sent it slinking back, remembering too late that there are some things which a Timothy Hulme handles without consulting his mind. Cringing under its punishment like a dog whipped for merely sniffing at a toothsome piece of offal, it returned humbly to its proper business which was by no means to weigh whether or not stolen goods should be returned but to invent safe ways and means to practice what honor decreed.

But how could a safe way be devised until more was known about the person to whom restitution was to be made? The first step was, of course, to find out what kind of human being this Susan Barney was.

Could any evidence be extracted from these last all-too-well-remembered contacts with her? Not very much. The girl who sat across the table, transfigured with the joy of those who feel the world's heart beat, after long doubt of it as fire or ice—it was impossible for the man who had fooled her into that deluded gladness to recall it objectively. He looked away from her to the other girl, half-veiled in blue twilight, lifting her hand with that slow gentle gesture to brush away the golden autumn leaf. Odd how often the recollection of an incident was clearer than the reality had been. The human memory was like a slowly developing photographic plate, on which new details of color, texture, form, constantly emerge from a blank background. His mind, uneasily on guard, often reminded him in suitable academic phrases that this familiar phenomenon followed prosaic and impersonal laws of mental association. Pointing coldly to a paragraph on page 137 of a psychology textbook, his mind cautioned him that whatever is before your eyes at a moment of—well, say, of great surprise—is physically printed on your nerves of vision. If you had just saved yourself from being run over by a railway train, its whirling wheels would have been stamped upon your visual memory with the same accuracy, wouldn't they, as the unimportant fact that the iris of those gray eyes is ringed with a cleanly drawn black line? Of course.

Yes, Mr. Hulme understood all that. He had studied physiological psychology; only a few years ago he had gone to a university summer school to brush up on the latest developments in that science. He knew what textbooks say about the tricks played on us by our nerves. He was aware of the complicated biochemical processes by which his nerves of vision had seen much more than he had, as they always do. He quite understood why at the most incongruous moments they now held up before his memory one after another of the details they had registered: the black ribbon which with an Alice-in-Wonderland plainness held back the light-brown hair, hanging almost to the shoulders. He saw now that the hair was not massive, not like a metal casque as some hair is. Weightless as thistledown, soft as floss silk, it did not so much fall as float about her quiet face. He saw her shoes, white canvas, without heels, not new, clean, worn, shaped by wear to the feet which walked silently away over the grass. The long throat, Botticelli slim, not Rosetti full. The strong tanned rustic hands, acquainted with effort, Durer hands not Van Dyke. The inelegant cotton stockings. And the enveloping apron she had put on, after a time he saw that it was blue, a gray-blue which melted into the dusk. Strange that he had not noticed the color when he had seen it. He looked long at it now, as the dusk of his memory gradually darkened with the slow eddying fall of the leaf. Sinking to its end like the day, like the year, it reached the earth which was to be its tomb and lay still. Each time this happened, darkness hid the girl who looked down at it, and he found himself gazing at the other girl, across the table from him, moved to selfless joy by a fraud for which he was responsible.

AFTER A WHILE he became aware that his mind was assuring him rather insistently that the young face now so familiar to him was not pretty, except as every young thing is pretty, that it was, ever so little concave; "dished," he had heard his father and mother call faces like that. But even after his mind had succeeded in drawing his attention to this defect and in suggesting a disparaging word for it, he could do nothing with the fact but wonder why it should give the girl such an appealing expression. Why should a defect seem touching, he asked himself naively?

Continuing to consider that face he presently saw that, apart from the eyes which were wide and clear, set rather deeply under the strong arched bone of the brow, it was undistinguished, had but one true beauty, the mouth. And the instant that thought came to him, he knew that the mouth was not beautiful at all, that it was rather large, the lips not very clearly sculptured against the clear tan of her country face, not very red, not remarkable in any way—just a wide, soft, young, firm, girl's mouth. But watching her one day across the table as she looked down with a smile at Mr. Dewey's old dog, he found himself thinking that it was a lovely, lovely mouth, tender, brave, honest—a mouth that——

The principal of the academy took a drink of water and wiped his lips hard with his napkin. The idiocy a man's reflexes could inflict upon him. And at any age! For two decades his classes had been made up of girls and boys, young women and young men. He had taught them English, skating, history, tennis, Latin. They had taught him that young beauty is a mute deception. Shining candid eyes, looking straight into yours—he had learned the hard lesson that like the sheen on clustering young curls, and the tenderly seductive modeling at the base of adolescent throats, they enshrined deceit, mediocrity, and cold egotism quite as readily as honor and integrity.

He was, he often thought, inoculated against the almost invincible magic of youth, from having been exposed to it so long. If his life had taught him anything it was that little is to be learned about any young person by looking at him, and nothing at all by looking at a girl. Something to be risked, too, as in gazing down into a whirlpool. His recent moment of dizziness had once more proved that. The reaction of his senses to the soft youthfulness of her lips had certainly added nothing to his knowledge of her character.

Secretly vain as he was of his carefully acquired technique of self-mastery, he was annoyed by that reflex of his nerves, and, prescribing for himself as he would for another, decreed a period of concentration on more important matters. It was absurd to be giving any thought to trivial personal affairs when all Europe, shuddering, held its hands over its ears, dreading the explosion of war. He concentrated on the Times, which, arriving in Clifford on the late afternoon train, was an evening rather than a morning paper, and focused his eyes if not his mind on the latest discoveries in astronomy, in biology, in archaeology.

Holding forth on one of these themes one evening at Miss Peck's table, Mr. Hulme became aware of a dialogue going on at the other end of the table—Mrs. Washburn was putting Susan through one of her ruthlessly prying inquisitions. He hastily withdrew from the talk he had begun and cocked his ear to profit by questions which would have been beneath his dignity to ask. "No, I don't remember my father and mother," Susan answered patiently. "They died when I was a little girl. Delia—she's my sister—was a baby. Yes, Father was Peter Barney's son. But I don't know much about the Barney relatives. Most of them live over the mountain, and up North, Newport way. There aren't many anyhow. Grandfather Cadoret brought us up. Yes, it was his mother that was John Crandall's wife."

THERE was a name Mr. Hulme recognized. John Crandall was the farmer and sheep raiser who shortly after the Civil War had left his money to the academy, the only gift ever made to it since its foundation and all that made its existence now possible. For Clifford, any connection with the John Crandall was a prize in a family record, colorless, sound, anonymous, as most of them were, without a spot either of decay or distinction.

Mrs. Washburn was saying, more dryly than she usually spoke, "I knew your grandfather Cadoret. We were in the same class at the 'cademy. It's funny, but—for a woman—your voice is some like his." She was silent, and then, "What kind of a woman was his wife?"

"We never knew our grandmother," said the girl. "She had died before grandfather took us to live with him. Our mother was their only child."

The intrusive questions continued, the candid answers followed. He listened, ashamed to be listening, straining not to lose a word. "But he died that year, grandfather did, the year I graduated from normal school. No, he didn't leave us the house. Oh, no. I don't mean he left it to anybody else. He had put a mortgage on it—Delia and I never knew about that till after he died—bigger than it was really worth. That's what had put me through the academy and the normal school. I believe one of the Ashley banks took it over. No, I don't think the bank ever found anybody to buy it. They had an auction and sold off the furniture and farm tools, but nobody wanted the place. It's a very small house, awfully old-fashioned, and too far from the valley road to be practical to farm. It's the last one on the old road to the Crandall Pitch. The road is very steep there, and it used to get washed out often, and the town hated to keep it up, even as far as our house. When it rained hard we always ran out with hoes to turn the water off. Well, no, you could hardly call it a farm—a wood lot and three fields, and a garden. Yes, oh, yes, a barn, of course. Grandfather always kept hens and a pig and a couple of cows. No, no sheep."

To Mr. Hulme, familiar now with the ways of his adopted country-side, it was easy to fill in the gaps of this outline, and a good many times after that, when he was holding the Times up before his eyes, he was telling himself the whole story—the little girl who grew up as fast as she could to take care of the house and the younger sister; the old man steeped in the Danton and New England tradition that after bread the people's need is education, who risked—and lost—all that he had, his infinitesimal all, to live up to that tradition with these children of his daughter; the girl stooping her shoulders to carry the burden of responsibility for her younger sister's education. Such stories were common in the valley. When Timothy Hulme, the educator, sitting alone in his office, remembered one of them, he was often moved to a shamed, contrite knocking on the breast, and a reminder of them during an educational convention nearly always brought on one of his painful attacks of acid indigestion.

BUT THIS TIME what he saw in that familiar story was what he was looking for, an indication of character. It certainly, he told himself thoughtfully, cast more light on her personality than anything in her academy record, which, when he looked it up, proved to be like anybody's. Odd that he remembered her so vaguely. He had thought he had in his memory something about nearly every one of the 600-odd students who had passed through the academy since his time. But when he tried to think back to the Susan Barney of only eight years before, what he saw—so close he could have touched her with his hand—was no shadowy memory of an adolescent, but a woman wrapped in twilight blue, who stood under an ancient tree, her quiet eyes bent on a golden and green leaf eddying sleepily to the ground. When the leaf touched the close-clipped grass and sank, reconciled and appeased, into its last stillness, the picture faded. As long as it was slowly circling without haste down through the still blue twilight he could never look away.

But he could, and after the warning of that slip of his foot on the brink of the whirlpool, he did look away from the girl herself and began to use his ears rather than his eyes. One of the theories with which he and his mind often amused themselves lightly was that nature had apparently not provided for the voice that extravagant supply of the gold-dust of glamor with which youth so easily bedazzles older people. He meant older men. In interviews with girl students he had found that if he looked rigorously away from them, he could often succeed in hearing rather than seeing what they said. And what they said told him a good deal of what they were. He listened now, evening after evening, to the low-pitched young voice, and although depressed to hear her use the long-drawn out rustic "ey-ah" for yes, which he fought so vainly in his classes, and blithely say "reckonize" and "like I did," in spite of all his anathemas, he decided it was an honest voice that rang true. He could not have defined what he meant by that phrase, but it meant enough to push a good deal of his uncertainty behind him.

Another push came from a small incident during the annual "at home" to the freshmen. This was always held in Dewey House, the co-operative home for poorer out-of-the-village students to which old Mr. Dewey had given up his house. In its two large parlors each year's new students were formally welcomed into academy life. Before starting to this annual reception, Mr. Hulme had gone through a familiarly futile attempt to make Aunt Lavinia presentable enough for a social event. He had found her listening to a melting tenor singing Fruhlingsnacht, and after one grim look at her he had begun, feeling serely autumnal, not to say wintry, to rummage in the jungle of her closet for a dress less rumpled and soiled than the one she had put on. When she saw what he was doing she turned off the whirling disk to say tartly, as though he were a little boy and impertinent at that, "Now Tim, now Tim, that'll do! That'll do! Who do you think I am? A Yankee old maid?"

In an instant they were in one of their quick-flaring altercations of which he was always ashamed and which he would have been horrified to have anyone else hear. "You'd look a great deal cleaner if you were a Yankee old maid!" he told her. She was the only person with whom he ever bickered. She was the one person with whom he should never bicker. But he could not help it. "As if a Coulton," she cried, swelling with indignation, "needed to think of her clothes like a housemaid asking for work!"

"Look at the grease spots on that skirt! Do ye think that being a Coulton is going to . . ."

"That's enough, Tim. Not another word out of you. You were brought up to know better! Give me your arm now."

ᔓᔕ

So she had imperiously done as she wished, as—Timothy thought—she always did when she roused herself enough to wish anything, and had gone to the party with a straggle of grease spots down the front breadth of her dress, and a gray unwashed line around her wrinkled neck.

"Oh, well," thought her nephew resignedly, helping her into the Ford, "what else do I stay in Clifford for?" Clifford being hardened by experience to the oddities of old age and firm in its habit of accepting without question whatever it was used to.

The flurry about her looks had as usual made but the most passing impression on Aunt Lavinia. They were still, with brakes set hard, slowly crawling down Academy Hill when she asked amiably, "Isn't it extraordinary the way people will get married to that stupid Mendelssohn thumpity-thump, when there's a love song like the Fruhlingsnacht would melt a stone? What did they play at your wedding, Tim? I never heard."

"How would I remember?" he said curtly, still ruffled.

"Was it in church?"

"Yes."

"Oh, of course. Ellie's guardian was a clergyman. Well, it must have been the Mendelssohn. Clergymen think it's part of the service."

A little later she murmured, "Well, I don't know . . . no, Fruhlingsnacht wouldn't do . . . after all a wedding . . ."

By the time they arrived in front of the handsome old colonial house, every window in its three stories lighted in honor of the occasion, she was, in a dreaming murmur, going on with the Schumann just where she had been interrupted. Her nephew, too, had picked up a dropped thread, remembering that Susan Barney had been one of the first to profit by Dewey House after it had been opened for poorer students. Miss Ingraham, therefore, who had been its director from the beginning, would probably know more about the girl's personality than anyone else in town. Not that he could profit by that! He smiled to himself at the thought of the sensation in town, if he were to ask Miss Ingraham to tell him what she remembered. Old China itself, he reflected, steering Aunt Lavinia up the front steps, could not have been more criss-crossed with invisible, unquestioned conventions and tabus, than Clifford. Than any old and settled human community.

The door opened before them, the students crowded together in the front hall and all along the stairs, greeted him with the traditional "Academy! Academy! One! Two! Three! Clifford Academy, here are we!" and the later variation, "Clifford Academy and old T. C.!"

Nodding and smiling his acknowledgment while they went from this to the "Some say haw! Some say gee!" yell, taking off his hat, steadying Aunt Lavinia as she caught her heel in a rip in the hem of her long skirt, Timothy's mind gave a skip and a hop and took a little run around the idea of the fundamental soundness of folkways. How far back in forgotten eons had timorous naked human beings discovered that to scream loudly all together gave them an emotional feeling of solidarity and strength? Astonishing, the instinct that told these life-ignorant young mountaineers that nothing could more quickly make newcomers feel themselves members of the tribe. "Ah, how do you do, Miss Ingraham," he said in his second-best tone, for he thought her drab and uninteresting, though worthy, and often wondered how, with all that is now known about dieting, it as possible for any woman to go around with such a waistline.

THE RECEIVING-LINE was formed, Mr. Hulme at the head, tall and black in his 15-year-old swallow-tails, young Bowen at the other end, scornfully correct in his brand-new dinner coat. Shaking hands, making an effort to get people's names straight, trying to remember what the last installment was of the serial story of each person's life, saying, "I hope your wife's health is much better, Mr. Conley," and, "Well, Johnnie, congratulations on the new son," Mr. Hulme perceived that Miss Ingraham was not at ease. From odds and ends of her talk he gathered that she was distressed by three of her freshmen, two boys and a girl. At the last moment they had been stricken with panic, and instead of coming down to the party had barricaded themselves in their rooms. Such cases of anguished shyness were not uncommon among students from district schools. Miss Ingraham was always on the lookout for trouble of this kind at the beginning of each year, prided herself on success in preventing it, and was now lamenting over her failure to foresee this. Mr. Hulme heard her saying over and over, "If they'd given me any idea beforehand—if I had dreamed that . . ."

The teachers of the primary school, in their well-intentioned best dresses, started down the receiving line, shaking hands, Susan Barney among them. At the sight of her Miss Ingraham burst into a loud, "Susan! Why didn't I think of you? You know the Churchmans road people, don't you?" and dragging her to one side, stood on tiptoe to whisper in her ear. Susan nodded and disappeared.

"How do you do, Mrs. Nye? Good evening Mrs. Merrill. Ah, Andrew, how goes it? Why, Nellie, I thought I'd start those Sunday afternoons along about the middle of November, as usual. Oh, go ahead, Charlie, you're an alumnus now—all the alumni call me T. C. Now see here, Miss Gardner, I spell my name with an I. You've got it H-U-M-E- on that Red Cross list. How do you do, Miss Lane?" said Mr. Hulme, keeping the eyes in the back of his head open and watchful. He saw nothing to his purpose till later when the older Dewey House students were passing the ice cream and cake. He was sitting then between young Dr. Craft's wife (his second wife) and Aunt Lavinia, one eye on her plate of ice cream so that he could snatch it if it started to slide out of her strengthless fingers. Glancing down the long double parlor he saw at the far end the new teacher of physics leaning in elegant and solitary ennui against the wall, an expression of faint distaste on his face. He was watching something. Following the direction of his eyes, Mr. Hulme saw a lively group of boys and girls in a corner, Susan Barney is their midst. They were heartily and, with considerable noise, enjoying each other's company. The older ones, Andrew Hawley and Duane Lambert and Molly Griffith and Lilly Boardman (the little wretch) were radiant in the touching, never-to-be-known-again self-confidence of seniors. But three among them were in the freshman class. Two big-boned farm boys stood back of Susan looking over her head at the party, the third, a girl, small as a child, clung close to her side. Yet they were clattering their spoons relishingly on their plates as they ate their ice cream, "as good as anybody!" said their shyly proud eyes, said Susan Barney's smile, as she watched them, gulping and swallowing, reach boldly for more cake from the plates being passed.

Mr. Hulme nodded his head thoughtfully, lost his interest in the party (now that he had what he wanted from it), sank into preoccupied musings.

Follow Me Post

The annual membership campaign of the post has been initiated by the chairman of the recruiting campaign, Herman D. Downey. The next meeting of the post will be held Friday evening at the Washington Post Club. At that time plans for the fall and winter program of social events will be discussed.

Regular Veterans Association

V. E. Devereaux, of Gen. Malin Craig Post, No. 20, R. V. A., was elected national senior cammander of the organization last week at the national convention in New York. Elias J. Bennett, jr., and Roy D. Hopgood were appointed to the national executive committee.

At the next meeting—October 3—Commander Walter J. Boehm will report on convention activities. Carl Gardiner, of New York, was re-elected national commander of the Regular Veterans Association.

Rainbow Division Veterans

On Saturday evening, November 4, at the Indian Spring Country Club, members of District of Columbia chapter, Rainbow Division Veterans, will give their twenty-second annual midwinter dance.

Elmer F. Neagle, national president of the R. D. V., will head the group of distinguished guests from the chapters located in Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York.

American Legion

With few exceptions all members of the District Department of the American Legion have returned from the national convention in Chicago. Among other honors bestowed upon and won by this department was the election of Mrs. Ellen L. Warren to Chapeau National of the Eight and Forty and taking of third place in the snare drumming contest among Sons of the American Legion by Raymond A. Eichhorn, of Bunker Hill Squadron.

Fort Stevens Post

Fort Stevens Post, No. 32, will meet in Stansbury Hall Thursday at 8:15 p. m., with Commander Edwin L. Donaldson, presiding. On the agenda will be appointment of committee chairmen and adoption of membership, Americanism and community service programs formulated at a meeting of the executive committee last Wednesday.

Past Commander Abraham Miller, a member of the District of Columbia delegation to the national convention, will report on the convention.

Agriculture Post

United States Department of Agriculture Post, No. 36, announces that the installation of its newly elected officers previously scheduled to take place at the Lafayette Hotel on October 7 at 8:45 p. m. will be held instead at the Hamilton Hotel, Fourteenth and K streets northwest, on October 7 at 7:45 p. m.

A dinner at 6:30 p. m. will precede the installation and there will be dancing from 9 until 12.

Fenton N. Walter, 1735 F street northwest, or Carl Berger, 2507 Bunker Hill road northeast, are in charge of reservations for the dinner and dance.

Commerce Department Post

A meeting of the newly organized Department of Commerce Post, No. 45, was held in the department's auditorium Thursday evening.

Senior Vice Commander H. T. Thomas, who was unable to attend the regular installation ceremonies for the other officers of the post on September 8, because of illness, was installed by Commander Joseph R. Moore.

Sergt. Jaspar Post

Sergt. Jaspar Post, No. 13, will meet in the New Colonial Hotel on October 4 at 8 p. m. A dance and social will follow installation of the following officers elected for the coming year: Commander Douglas O. Reed, first vice commander, John P. Lester; second vice commander, H. A. Idaho Resort Increases Equipment

Sun Valley, Idaho.

An extensive improvement program at this all-year-round sports playground, which includes construction of a gigantic new ski lift, a new combination mountain cabin, restaurant and observatory, and four new skiers' chalets, is now well under way and will be completed in time for what the management anticipates will be Sun Valley's greatest and most exciting winter season.

The new lift is being built on Bald Mountain, one of Idaho's highest peaks, and will attain a 9,200 foot level, thus making skiing certain from November 15 to April 15. The lift, ont of the longest in the world, is being constructed in three units or stages, the total length to the summit being more than 11,500 feet. Passengers will change lifts at the end of each stage, the trip from Wood River canyon bottom to the summit requiring about twenty minutes. Chairs on the new lift will be equipped with newly designed windbreaks extending from head to feet, and there will be special brackets on which to rest feet and skis.

The new Bald Mountain cabin is being erected at the end of unit two of the lift, at an elevation of 7,876 feet. It will be a combination shelter hut, restaurant and observatory, the main portion of which will be octagonal and entirely glassed in. In the center will be a large four-sided fireplace, and out-of-doors there will be terraces for sun bathing and dining.

Rooms similar to accommodations in the present Skiers' Chalet will be available to 196 additional guests in the four new skiers' chalets now under construction.

Horseback Riding At Atlantic City

Atlantic City.

The horseback riders take over where the bathers left off tomorrow as the beach is opened to the equestrians.

The beach, wide, level and 8 miles long, has become known as the world's safest bridle path and from October to the end of May is a favorite with those persons who enjoy riding in the salted sunshine. Horses, stabled on the mainland throughout the summer months, are returned to the stands along the strand where they may be hired by the visitors at a nominal rental.

Horseback riding is at its best on the beach here. Starting from one of the up-town stands the rider jogs along past miles of palatial hotels and beautiful residences. On the other side of the path the roaring surf makes music and the crisp salt breezes blow off the ocean.

Paralleling the beach is the famous boardwalk. Here, in the early morning hours hundreds of bicyclists may be seen completing an autumn symphony. The bicycles, too, may be hired at numerous stands along the boardwalk, around the resort or in the hotels. Cycling is permitted before 9 a. m.

Guatemala Cruises Prove Popular With Travelers

Exploring Guatemala's highlands—scenic, historic and romantic—with their ancient cities, lakes and Indian villages, is the highlight of the all-expense 19-day cruises to this Central American country on the luxurious American ships of the United Fruit Co.'s Great White Fleet.

Departing every Tuesday from Philadelphia, the fast United Fruit liners head southward marking the beginning of 11 perfect days of gay shipboard life in which late-in-the-season vacationists enjoy a wide variety of deck games and sports. Steamers have built-in swimming pools.

Arriving at the Guatemalan seaport of Puerto Barrios, travelers entrain for a thrilling 200-mile trip through the lush country-side and mountain regions to Guatemala City.

MERCHANTS & MINERS LINE

Bridge

By Marian H. Barre

Wednesday, October 4, marks the officials opening of the 1939-40 season in the Washington Bridge League. The game to be played that evening at the Shoreham Hotel is the first of seven contests for open pairs. Following games in the series will be held on the first Wednesday of every month until May, 1940. These games act as qualifying rounds for the annual pair classic in June. Members of the league must compete in at least four pair games to be eligible for the annual round-up. As scores of each individual member must be recorded after every game, the official opening is the beginning of Director Astelford's bookkeeping activities and for members it is the reminder that life is real and bridge is earnest. During the summer games a bottom score might hurt the pride, but in the season it hurts the record.

League team matches begin on Wednesday, October 18, and continue on the third Wednesday of November, December, January, February, March and April. The same attendance qualification is necessary, that is, participation in at least four matches.

Also included on the league program are the Clifford Challenge Cup matches, which attract the best bridge talent in the Capital. These games started in advance of the regular season and two priority rounds were played in the last September game. The victorious teams were the foursome captained by Tom Hamlin, president of the league, and the Tubbs line-up. Hamlin was paired with E. B. Connolly, and teamed with Leroy Thurtell and Gene Herman; they defeated the team of Mr. and Mrs. Roger Payne, Martin May and Charles Johnson. Lewis Tubbs playing with Ralph Woodside, with the Wilfred St. Aubins as teammates, eliminating Mrs. Tom Hamlin, Mrs. Irene Surguy, Mrs. M. R. Reddy and Mrs. Rose Robins.

Present holders of the Clifford Cup are Al Roth, Joe Brotman, Louis Newman and John Mothershed. This line-up will meet the Hamlin team in a challenge match to be played this Wednesday. On the same evening the Tubbs team has a final priority match against the team of Mr. and Mrs. James H. Lemon, Mrs. Winslow Van Devanter and L. R. Watson, jr., the winners earning the right to challenge the victors of the Hamlin-Roth match. Meanwhile, four other teams will be engaged in priority rounds, the team captained by Lieut. Comdr. W. A. Corley meeting the Payne outfit, and Col. Edward B. Clifford foursome playing the Gardner team. Col. Clifford is the donor of the cup.

Thirty-two members of the National Press Club turned out for the first duplicate game of the 1939-40 series, held in the club auditorium last Monday evening. Partnership went by lottery, all players names went in the hat. This was the first of the innovations promised by the games committee. The next Press Club game, slated for the evening of Monday, October 9, will be a regulation open pair contest in which a player may select his partner. In the following game, on October 23, men will be pitted against women.

The Federal Bridge League season started the week of September 19, with 24 teams in the field and several foursomes still in process of formation. At the conclusion of the first game the Astleford line-up was in first place, with the Rangers, second; the Stags, third; I. D. R. A.-Ladies, fourth, and the Steinberg team in fifth place. Division into sections now will be made according to the ratings of the teams.

The Federal League will play every Tuesday evening for 14 weeks before Christmas. After a recess for the holidays, 14 more games will be held. Each half of the season is a separate contest with a play-off after the twenty-eighth game for the Luther Stewart Trophy, which symbolizes the championship of the league. All games will be held at Wardman Park Hotel.

The new quarters of the Washington Whist Club at 1345 Connecticut avenue have been found inadequate to take care of the many District masters who patronize the restricted Monday evening game. Hence this game will continue to be held at the Hotel Grafton, while rubber bridge will be played every day at the Connecticut avenue address.

With a Mitchell movement used in the first game of the Hotel Roosevelt series for the Times-Herald Cup, four players now share the honor of heading the Roosevelt list. They are: Mrs. C. W. Zimmer and Mrs. Mary Goodstein, winners in the north-south, and Tom Hamlin and Joe Brotman, in the east-west.

At the time this column was written, Seymour Kaplan, New York expert now connected with the Washington Whist Club, had played in four local duplicate games and had three wins to his credit. This is a record that has no equal here. The climate of the Capital hasn't been a healthy one for the metropolitan stars. On the other hand, the Washington bridge world has been distinctly helpful to newcomers with their reputations still to be made. Al Roth, Joe Brotman and Louis Newman all became national masters here in a very short period of time.

Picture of the Week—"Construction"

DAVID JOHNSON, 26 Sycamore avenue, Takoma Park, Md., winner of this week's contest has approached the subject of construction from the dramatic point of view. Shooting from a low angle, the use of a k-2 filter for a dark sky, and pattern effect produced by the shadows and rafters combine to make an effective photograph. Mr. Johnson used a a Voigtlander Brilliant camera, shooting at 1-100 sec. at f-11

All amateur photographers among The Post's readership are invited to submit entries in The Post's new "Picture of the Week" competition. The prize-winning picture will appear on this page each Sunday, and there will be a prize of $5 for the winner, to be selected by The Post's photographic staff.

At the Chess Table

By Willard Mutchler

The Capital City Chess Club last Saturday suffered one of its few defeats when the visiting Chess Divan players won a hard fought match by a score of 8 to 6. The Divan was leading by a lone point when Stuart Wagman extended the margin by beating H. A. Rousseau in a game which lasted nearly six hours. Plans are already afoot for a return match to be played at the Divan. The summary:

Germany Wins Title

Germany won the chess world's team championship title at Buenos Aires, Argentina, finishing only half a point ahead of Poland, its opponent on another field. Strangely enough, the European war may have been the deciding factor in the chess tournament. Had the matches between Germany and Poland and France been played, instead of agreed drawn because of the conflict, there might have been a different outcome. Germany's championship team consisted of Erich Eliskases, Paul Michel, Ludwig Engles, Albert Becker and Heinrich Reinhardt, while Poland was represented by Dr. S. Tartakower, Mendel Najdorf, Paul Frydman, Teador Regedzinski and Francis Sulik. Jose Capablanca was awarded a gold medal for his individual score of six wins and five draws. The final standings:

Team.	W.	L.	D.	Pts.
Germany	22	6	28	36
Poland	24	8	19	33½
Estonia	24	12	19	33½
Sweden	24	14	18	33

Koltanowski's Exhibitions

G. Koltanowski, Belgium blindfold expert, will shortly exhibit his wares in this city. Readers desiring boards are advised to place reservations early with Ariel Mengarini, of the Capital City Club, or with N. P. Wigginton at the Chess Divan. At the Divan Koltanowski will play 8 games blindfold simultaneously. There is room for 24 reservations, however, since three may consult at each board. At the Capital City 4 games will be conducted blindfold, while 15 will be played with the board in sight. The dates will be announced in the near future.

Solutions to Problems

Dr. Guy Clinton's No. 841 is solved by Q-R5, and this local composer today presents another offering to The Post's readers.

The Bridge Deck

By Florence Osborn

"Bridge is a partnership game." How many times we hear this said! But how many players really understand what it means and try to live up to it?

There is one sure thing: all the winning ones do. There are only a few winning players, though.

Until a contract fan learns to sink his personal ambitions into making out as best he can with the dunce across from him, he is not going to go very far.

You know how some players will try to do all the bidding, play most of the hands and leave their poor partner who may not be very adroit anyway, floundering with confusion and a feeling of incompetence.

By each partner's submerging his selfish aims, putting whatever abilities each possesses into the common problem, by uniting, there develops a force which is neither player, yet a part of both—a force which builds an intangible and unsurmountable barrier against the adversaries, a force which, though the pair be the most awkward of players, keeps their morale intact.

This force bridges the gap between the partners, letting them interchange their strength.

"Well played, partner."

"You couldn't help it—bad break."

"That's my partner!"

Words don't mean much, but when there is a feeling behind them the sorriest dub of all has been known to make a grand coup.

Good players are wise; they fight on their partner's side because they know it is same as their own. They are not altruists but they are willing to put away a few of their conceits to wind up on the plus side of the score sheet.

Good and bad teamwork is illustrated in the hand for today, reported by W. Howard "Uncle Bing" Woolworth, from an upstate tournament.

His partner, a Cleveland expert, sitting in the East seat, followed the profitable bidding with an inspirational opening lead to defeat the opponents' part-score contract five tricks for a bonus of 900 points.

This is what Uncle Bing says:

"Harry Feinberg demonstrated the most complex phase of the game, defensive play, on this deal. Virtually a double-dummy opening lead, along with glittering card-play by East. Uncle Bing, pushing cards with his customary aplomb (put down that brick), sat West.

"East made the superb opening of the spade ten, the jack was played from the board and West won with the king. West returned the heart queen. North covered with the king. East won with the ace and laid down the heart jack for the third trick. East now led the eight of spades. South and West both ducked and the eight held the trick. East now exited from his hand with the four of hearts. West had to cover the nine from the board with the ten and declarer ruffed with the five of diamonds.

"North now laid down the diamond ace, returned the six of diamonds. East properly ducked and West won with the queen. West returned the spade king, North ruffed with the diamond nine and East overruffed with the ten.

"East now laid down the diamond king, pumping declarer's last trump, and completed the disintegration of the contract by cashing two more heart tricks. North won the last two tricks when East had to lead away from the club king-nine into the ace-queen in the closed hand."

Symphony

December 10, 1908, is one of the most interesting contemporary French composers. His works for organ, chorus and orchestra are characterized by Catholic mysticism and suggest a continuation of Franck and Vincent d'Indy. His symphonic poem, "The Forgotten Offerings," has been previously played in this country only by the Boston Orchestra.

Karol Rathaus is a Polish-German composer, born in Tarnopol September 16, 1895. A pupil of Franz Schreker, he has written five operas, two symphonies and other orchestral works. His suite, probably the first of his compositions to be heard in this country, is drawn from the opera, "Uriel Acosta," which was written for the Habimah Theater in Jerusalem.

Guenther Raphael, composer of the "Smetana Suite," was born in Berlin April 30, 1903. His compositions include choral and orchestral works and chamber music. As far as can be ascertained from records, this suite has not been performed in the United States.

In the British Museum last spring, Dr. Kindler came upon a practically unknown Haydn symphony, No. 46 in B major, and copied the score in order to give the work its first American performance. Almost as unfamiliar and unplayed as the Haydn symphony is Mozart's symphony, No. 34, in C major, which Dr. Kindler recently unearthed in the Library of Congress.

Another novelty is a ballet suite by Dr. Ernst Kanitz, Austrian composer, who is now teaching at Winthrop college in South Carolina; it has been played only once before in this country. Dr. Kindler also plans to present Howard Hanson's "Romatic" symphony. Schoenberg's orchestral arrangement of Brahms' G minor quartet for piano and strings, Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," Richard Strauss' "Aus Italien," Bach's Church Cantata No. 39, Schumann's fourth symphony, Stravinski's "Zhar Ptitza" suite, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and John Alden Carpenter's piano concertino in which Percy Grainger will be the soloist.

All these works will be played in either the mid-week or the first Sunday afternoon series in which other soloists will be Moriz Rosenthal, Kirsten Flagstad, Nino Martini, Albert Spalding, Myra Hess, Marjorie Lawrence, Maurice Marechal, Ossy Renardy, Marcel Mass and Rene Le-Roy. The second Sunday series of "beloved symphonic masterpieces" will include the Franck symphony, Brahms' first, Beethoven's fifth, Chaikovski's fifth and Rimzki-Korsakov's "Shahrazad" suite. The final concert of this series will be a "request" program.

Swing

him only eleventh in swing but first in sweet! Gray switched the band's style when he felt swing was on the decline. Regardless of the accuracy of his prediction, his transformation was phenomenal.

Discographers should like Glen's latest, "Prelude in C Sharp Minor," just out. And you shouldn't be without his "Sunrise Serenade" At the last count, Glen tells me, sales on this masterpiece were not only ahead of Glenn Miller's version but ahead of any record of the year.

Record Briefs

Novelty of the week is Cab Calloway's "Utt Da Zay" with the Cab sounding more than ever like a cantor. Catch his double talk in the last scat chorus. Calloway's two first rank instrumentalists, Tenor Saxist Chu Berry and Drummer Cosey Cole, get a deserved play on the reverse, "Crescendo in Drums."

Panic of the week is "Boy Scout In Switzerland" as interpreted by Shep Fields, king of the Mickey Mouse bands.

Vocal treats come from Helen Ward, whom you'll remember as Benny Goodman's first and greatest vocalist, this time with Bob Crosby on "Day In—Day Out;" and from mocking bird Helen O'Connell who continues as the most successful imitator of Mildred Bailey and finishes her last line in exact Ella Fitzgerald fashion. All this mimicry takes place on Jimmy Dorsey's "One Sweet Letter From You." And don't overlook Jimmy's alto work, either.

Best jazz of the week, by a walkaway, is Erskine Hawkins' tasty "Tuxedo Junction." Second place to the reverse, "Gin Mill Special."

"Pretty" of the week is Glenn Miller's "Blue Moonlight." Lyric of the week is "Put That Down In Writing" as handled by Tony Pastor for Artie Shaw.

D. Sterling Wheelwright continues his free organ recitals at 8 p. m. in the Washington Chapel L. D. S., Sixteenth street and Columbia road. Tomorrow's program includes "Three Mountain Sketches," by Joseph Clokey, recently appointed dean of music at Miami University. Bach's "St. Anne" Fugue and Widor's brilliant Toccata are highlights in Wednesday's program. Edna C. Wheelwright, soprano, will assist Friday evening, singing three Schubert Lieder: "Die Forelle," "Du bist die Ruh'" and "Who Is Sylvia."

Stamp News and Notes From the Clubs

In spite of the European war the issues of new foreign stamps continue to come out as per schedule. French and British dealers are still operating as usual and collectors in the United States are eager for all sorts of items coming from the European war zones.

France has another new pictorial, 90-centimes, carmine rose on lavender. This stamp is horizontal and pictures the famous historical castle of Henry IV at Pau, showing the noted bridge and hotel. Pau is the capital of the Basses-Pyrenees. This stamp was issued without any previous announcement. The 90-cent, ultramarine, of the peace variety has been overprinted "F. M." in red.

France has also issued for offices in Morocco two sets, one for regular postage of 25 denominations and of air mails, six values. It is stated that such large sets as these are what has caused recent agitation on the part of collectors looking to a boycott if fewer and less expensive stamps are not issued. These stamps were released on July 17, 1939. The regular series, designs, values and colors are as follows: 1-centime, violet, Mosque at Sale; 2-cent., green, Mosque at Safron; 3-cent., ultramarine, Mosque at Safron; 5-cent., dark green, Mosque at Sale; 10-cent., violet, Mosque at Safron; 15-cent., dark green, Cedars in the Atlas; 20-cent., black brown, Cedars in the Atlas; 30-cent., dark blue, a shepherd in the Argassius; 40-cent., brown, 45-cent., blue green, same design as the 30-cent; 50-cent, carmine, and 60-cent., Prussian blue, fortifications at Sale; 70-cent., violet, Gazelles; 75-cent., light blue, Valley of Dades; 90-cent., ultramarine, fortifications at Sale; 1-franc, brown, Cedars in the Atlas; 1.25f, brown and 1.40f, violet, Valley of Dades; 2-f., green, air view of Fez and 2.25-f., dark blue, air view of Fez; 2.50-f. vermilion, Mosque at Sale; 3-f., gray, air view of Fez; 5-f., indigo, Gazelles; 10-f., red and 20-f., violet brown, Gazelles. The air mail set: 80-cent., green, 1-f., dark red, 5-f., purple, stocks at Fez 1.90-f., ultramarine, 3-f., and 10-f., Prussian green, plane and map.

Poland has brought out several new issues and these promise to be rare items. Just how these stamps will come out of that war-troubled land is unknown. A set of three stamps for the Gordon-Bennett balloon races for this fall was issued. It will be recalled that in 1938 Poland won the race and the race this year was to have been flown from Lwow. The denominations of the air post issue: 25-g. brown, 75-g. red and 1-z., dark blue. A portrait of James Gordon Bennett, donor of the trophy, appears on the 25-g., value; the Belgian balloon "Belgica" on the 75-g., and a map of Poland with Lwow marked, with balloons, is on the 1-z. denomination. Commemorative stamps and a sheet for the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Polish Legion have been received with August cancelations by many Washington collectors. This jubilee stamp, shows 25-gr., slate, shows Polish troops in marching formation at the left and right with a portrait of Marshal Pilsudski in the center. The souvenir sheet in honor of the legion shows the jubilee stamp; one showing a portrait of Pilsudski, in mourning, and a third stamp with a portrait of Marshal Smigly-Rydz. The values of each stamp is 25-gr. The sheet sold for 75-gr., plus 1.00-zl.

Japan has released its fourth set of stamps in its national park series. The stamps show scenes in the Aso National Park on Kiushu Island. There is also a souvenir sheet enclosed in a descriptive folder. The stamps: 2-sen, ochre, Mount Kuju; sen, green, the central peak of Mount Aso; 10-sen, read, crater of the central peak; and 20-sen, blue, volcanic cone of Mount Aso.

Salvador on September 25 issued a set of three stamps in honor of the centenary of the battle of San Pedro Perulapan. The stamps are all overprinted in red: "1839.25. Setiembre. 1939" and "Batalla San Pedro Perulapan." the stamps used are: 1935, 50-c., indigo, surcharged 8-c.; 1935, 1-col., black, surcharged 10-c.; and 1924, 1-col., green and violet, surcharged 50-c.

Many correspondents have requested more enlightment regarding the new and old processes of "electric eye" plates and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The terms "old design," "new design," and "convertible," as applied by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to the respective types of electric eye plates are used merely for the purpose of plate identification. A description of the layout for each type of electric eye plate follows:

"Electric eye postage stamp plates, old design."—These plates were laid out with a center verticle row of dashes and a single horizontal dash on the right side margin in the center of the full sheet. These plates are 400-subject ordinary and 200-subject commemorative, and sheets printed therefrom are usable only on the older electric eye perforating machine.

"Electric eye postage stamp plates, new design."—These plates were laid out with the same center vertical row of dashes as on the old design. There was omitted the single horizontal dash on the right side margin of the old design, and there was added a row of horizontal dashes on the left margin of the sheet. These plates are 400-subject ordinary and 200-subject commemorative, and sheets printed therefrom are usable only on the new electric eye perforating machine.

"Electric eye postage stamp plates, convertible."—These plates were made so that the sheets printed therefrom are usable on both the old and the new electric eye perforating machines. They contain the same dashes as on the "Old Design" plates, namely, a center vertical row of dashes and a horizontal dash on the right side margin, and they also contain a row of horizontal dashes on the left margin of the sheet exactly as on the "New Design" plates. These plates also have been made only 400-subject ordinary and 200-subject commemorative. These plates will not go to press until more new electric eye perforators are installed.

Harry E. Stine, assistant deputy third assistant postmaster general and chief clerk, represented the Post Office Department at the annual convention of the American Philatelic Society September 25 to September 29.

Officials of the Canal Zone have given out figures regarding the sale of the twenty-fifth anniversary commemorative stamps issued August 15, 1939. More than a quarter of a million letters with the special cancelations were forwarded to New York abroad the Grace Line steamer 'Santa Lucia." This consignment totaled more than 3,000 pounds. The Canal Zone mail consisted of 18 bags while the United States mail weighed 2,633 pounds and filled 76 bags. First-day sales totaled $21,729.58 at the Canal Zone postoffices. A total of 230,975 letters were mailed in the special United States postoffice on the U. S. S. Charleston. Canal Zone officials state that the special issues will remain on sale until all stamps are disposed of.

It was voted at the meeting of the Collectors Club, Branch 5, S. P. A., Tuesday evening that three awards be made during the exhibitions during National Philatelic Week, November 12 to November 18. Col. Charles S. Hamilton, president of the club, donated the first award, a valuable set of Philippine stamps. The other two prizes are of $3 and $2 values of stamps. Only one frame will be entered by any member and judging will be made the regular meeting following the exhibition.

Vice President E. L. Browne, Treasurer C. H. Vaughan and the executive secretary, Mrs. Josephine B. Hoppe have resigned and the following nominations were made to be acted upon at a later meeting: For vice president, John Steele; for treasurer, Walter H. Cottrell, Guy A. Greenawalt and Arthur W. Van Heuckeroth, and executive secretary, John A. Dunkel.

The program for October was announced as follows: Tuesday, October 3, auction sale and cover exhibition; October 10, address on "The Stamps of the Philippines" and exhibition by Col. Charles S. Hamilton; October 17, auction sale and exhibition by Ernest Woodhouse; October 24, address by Supt. John Hardy, of the Railway Mail Service; exhibition by C. C. Wilharm, of Pittsburgh, Pa., and October 31, address by Harlan Miller, of The Washington Post, and exhibition by Constant Lambrette.

Scott's 1940 edition of the Standard Catalogue was issued on September 25, 1939.

Postoffice officials say that the philatelic truck has been visited by 275,000 people since it left Washington on May 15. More than 150,000 copies of the junior stamp booklet have been sold.

The Postoffice Department has ruled that no mail shall be carried on certain trips operated by airlines before they have been authorized by the Department. It has been ascertained that some postmasters have permitted the dispatch of air mail on trips not authorized. This notice is regarded as of vital importance to all collectors who are anxious to have only regular first-flight covers in their collections.

While the United States on Monday, September 25, 1939, issued a commemorative postage stamp honoring the 300th anniversary of printing in Colonial America, Mexico has issued two sets of stamps to commemorate the 400th anniversary of printing in Mexico.

Two sets of three stamps each have been issued, three air mails and three regular postage. The regular postage set includes: Two-centavos, black, showing a portrait of Friar John de Zumarraga, the first bishop of Mexico, who in 1539 received the printing concession from Spain for the new colony of Mexico; 5-centavos, green, depicting the Bells Building, Mexio City, where the first printery was opened in 1539, and the 10-centavos, red, with the portrait of Antonio de Mendoza, the first viceroy of New Spain who aided in the establishment of early printing.

The air mail set includes: 20-centavos, blue, showing the first engraving printed in Mexico in 1544, a religious scene; 40-centavos, dark green, illustrates the cover of the first compilation of Mexican laws in 1563, and the 1-peso, sepia and red, shows the collophon of the oldest existing Mexican publication in Mexico. This collophon is in the National Library in Madrid.

On all of the stamps the description is the same. The postage set at the top has "Correos Mexico" and the denomination, while on the air mail stamps the word "Aereo" is added. Below the inscription reads: "1539—Commemorative—1939, Fourth Centenary of Printing in Mexico, the first in America."

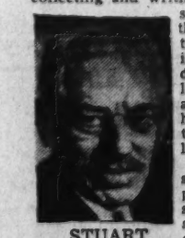
By the sinking on September 15, 1939, of the Belgian motor ship "Alex Van Opstal," which sailed from New York City on September 6 for Antwerp, Belgium, 79 sacks of regular mail, including 15 sacks of foreign closed transit mail, were lost. Of the 64 sacks of United States origin there were 13 sacks of registered mail containing 267 registered articles, 10 sacks of letters, 34 sacks of prints and equipment.

The Chicago Philatelic Society will hold an exhibition at Hotel LaSalle from October 13 to October 15. There will be many awards including tablets of gold, silver and bronze finish.

The Washington Philatelist

By William M. Stuart.

Fifty years is a long period to carry on a tradition or hobby. Just 50 years ago the writer began the publication of a small journal devoted to philately, spending the succeeding years in collecting and writing of stamps. When the first issue of this small journal appeared in September, 1889, there were about 350,000 stamp collectors in the United States. Today the latest estimate is between nine and ten millions. Those early days were difficult since at that time the public had little regard for stamp collecting. But as the years passed, interest increased in the hobby, the press recognized its worth and today philately has become firmly established.



STUART.

In years of philatelic writing one fact stands out prominently—it is a hobby always presenting something new. Each day presents new problems concerning the postage stamp which has in its make-up secrets that only time, study and effort can bring out. No one can honestly or safely declare the science mastered. It is in the spirit of an adventurer the genuine philatelist finds himself, for as he adds to his collection he also adds to his knowledge of the arts and sciences.

So it is with this writer. In his feeble way he has endeavored to spread goodwill and fellowship through the medium of the postage stamp and for him the adventure has been far greater by reason of the friendships acquired. No one has a monopoly on philatelic writing or stamp collecting. There are no "firsts" in any of philately's favorite paths, for the road is broad enough to include all. The passing years have developed many interesting factors in stamp collecting and the very air seems teeming with issues.

The writer congratulates stamp collectors everywhere, for in the half century of his activity he has seen the United States grow from a nation to a world power. In the days of trial and difficulty that possibly lie ahead he acknowledges his faith in his country and considers the honor of being an American citizen the finest in all the world.

Mount Vernon Seminary To Open New Building

below, looks over plans for the new building being erected on the Mt. Vernon Seminary grounds. The building, pictured at the left, will house classrooms and a large recreation hall

Addition to House Class Rooms, Large Recreation Hall; To Be Completed by December

Mount Vernon Seminary which opened its sixty-fifth year on Thursday with students representing all parts of the country and many day school students of the Capital City, and which is already settled into its regular school routine for the coming autumn and winter season, will open a new building in the near future, necessitated by the demand for additional class room and recreational requirements. The building is an attractive brick structure—two stories in height—and is joined to the main building of the school by a covered walk connecting with the indoor gymnasium.

Four large classrooms on the first floor will be occupied by the department of history, of which Dr. Elmer L. Kayser is lecturer; the department of philosophy, of which Dr. C. G. Garnett is lecturer; the department of American Government of which Dr. H. M. Merriman is lecturer, and the departments of mathematics and French under Mlles. Suzanne Donza and Jeanne Canton.

The second floor contains a large student recreation room equipped with built-in fireplace, electric stove, settees and lounges; and opening out from the recreation room, is a large sun porch. There will also be a special room on this floor for the use of the members of the faculty. Designed by Wesley S. Bessell, well-known New York City architect, and built by the Prescott Construction Co. of this city, this new building is expected to play a large part in the recreation program of the seminary this winter. Although not quite completed, it is expected to be put in use by the first of December, perhaps sooner.

Yesterday the entire student body and faculty paused in their intensive opening school program to go to Great Falls for an afternoon picnic, returning for dinner, and for a general unpacking of trunks and boxes preparatory to Monday's regular school schedule.

Prominent members of the faculty include Anis Bradshaw, chemistry; Mary Louise Wright, organist and choir director; Steuart Henderson Britt, psychology; Helen Hill Currier, publications; Agnes De Lano, literature and history of art; Suzanna Donze, French and Spanish; Christopher Brown Garnett, jr., philosophy; Mildred Hanna, English; Elmer Louis Kayser, history; Laura K. Leonard, home economics; Olwen Lloyd, mathematics; Edith Madeleine Mack, dramatics; Howard Maxwell Merriman, American Government; Marie Milliette, voice; Marguerite C. Munn, art; Mary A. Nourse, economics; Jeannette Pearson, physical education; Elsa Raner, violin; Leonora Cortes, piano; Katherine Riggs, harp; Mary Catherine Stephen, science; Patricia Urner, physical education, and Lynda Stickles Edwards, librarian.

Columbia Tech Observes Anniversary

The Columbia Technical Institute of Washington is celebrating its thirtieth year as the oldest institute of its kind in the United States, announced Paul J. Leverone, principal.

The school, founded by the late Ray C. Claflin, began classes with a handful of students in a small room in the old McLaughlin Building, located at Twelfth and G streets northwest. The school at that time offered courses in mechanical and topographic drafting.

PAUL J. LEVERONE

Today the Columbia Technical Institute has grown to be one of the largest schools of its kind in the country. The drafting department now offers 12 courses in mechanical, aircraft, architectural, electrical, machine, landscape, statistical, Patent Office, structural steel, topographic, sheet metal pattern and special lettering.

Franklin Accountancy School Opens Tomorrow

Tomorrow at 9:30 o'clock the day division of the Benjamin Franklin Accountancy School will open, both freshman and advanced classes reporting at that time. A freshman class of 120 will be greeted by John T. Kennedy, president of the university, and by Dean Edwin C. Bosworth, of the accounting faculty.

States represented in the freshman registrations include New York, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, West Virginia, Georgia, Ohio and California.

Gunston Hall Adds Course In Radio Work

The department of speech and drama at Gunston Hall, under direction of Sally Fauntleroy Johnson, has added a course in radio transcription and script writing. A recording machine will demonstrate to the students the faults that they must work to overcome. Pitch and quality of tone, enunciation and accent will be given consideration. These recordings will be made from time to time throughout the school year, showing the progress of the student. Registration for this work will begin tomorrow following the organization of the regular schedule.

Josephine Wells Joins Strayer College Faculty

Mrs. Josephine Wells has been added to the staff of Strayer College as a full-time instructor in the typewriting department, according to an announcement by E. G. Purvis, vice president.

Mrs. Wells received a B. S. degree in education from Mary Washington College, in Fredericksburg, Va., and has taken graduate work at the University of Tennessee. She taught in the high schools of Virginia for several years and also served on the faculty of the commercial department.

Catholic U. Opens Session This Morning

The formal opening of the fifty-first academic year at the Catholic University will take place this morning with the offering of the solemn high mass of the Holy Ghost in the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception on the university campus at 10:30 o'clock.

The University Choir, under the direction of Dr. Leo Behrendt, will sing the Mass by Perosi, as arranged by Mgr. Leo P. Manzetti, of Baltimore, and Ett's "Ave Maria" will be rendered at the offertory of the mass.

The procession of lay students, both graduate and undergraduate, will start from McMahon Hall at 10:00 o'clock, proceeding across the campus to the shrine. The seniors will appear for the first time in their academic caps and gowns. At 10:15 the faculty of the university, together with the heads of the affiliated colleges and religious houses and members of the clergy in academic costume or religious vestments, will leave Caldwell Hall for the shrine.

At the conclusion of the mass the members of the faculty will make their profession of faith and will sign the register in fulfillment of this obligation, according to the statutes of the university.

The Rev. Gerald Dillon, of Providence, R. I., newly appointed dean of men at the Catholic University, will address the freshman class during the coming week, outlining the regulations pertaining to student life and activities and traditions on the campus. Both resident and non-resident students will be encouraged to join one or more of the various social, musical or professional groups in order to make themselves an integral part of the university life. Mr. Walter Donovan, '41, of Little Falls, New York, is extending an invitation to the freshmen to attend the first meeting of the Shahan Debating Society. As newly appointed president of the society, he has officially called this meeting for Thursday evening on the campus.

Ballet Classes Added By Hayden Studios

Additional classes in ballet have been added by the Phil Hayden Studios of Dance, 6 Dupont Circle, to meet the increased demand this season for this type of instruction. All students, whether they are beginners, professionals, children or adults, will be placed in groups with others of approximately the same age and skill.

Enrollment is underway at the studios and classes are forming in all types of dancing including tap, acrobatic, ballroom, etc. Private instruction also is offered in all branches.

Mr. Hayden credits the greater interest in ballet to a wider realization the movements are fundamental of all dance study, and a working knowledge adds grace and beauty to performance of the dancer in any type of work.

Special attention also will be given in the curriculum this year to the new ballroom dances, including Cuban and South American rhythms, Viennese waltzes and "swing."

Student Sells Novel

The Moneyway Studios of Short-Story Writing, which open for the sixteenth year tomorrow announce that Evelyn Vose Wise whose first novel was the selection of the Catholic Book of the Month Club for 1938, has just sold her third novel, "Wheels in the Timbers."

Strayer Students to Meet

An informal "get together" and dance for Strayer students will be held in the college building at Thirteenth and F streets on Saturday, October 7, from 8 o'clock to 11, according to an announcement by E. G. Purvis, vice president.

WOODWARD SCHOOL For Boys
(Accredited)
NOW—how does his school set-up meet your boy's requirements?
If he isn't fitting happily into the program, you will find the Woodward School offering just what he needs. We cannot all assimilate every subject easily—and there is where the Woodward School system comes to the rescue. Our small classes and men teachers provide the opportunity to personalize—giving the added help that is needed—a system that obviously cannot be followed in mass instruction.
Consult with Mr. King and see if the Woodward School doesn't offer just what your boy needs for his fullest development. He deserves it.
Enrollment in the Woodward School includes physical training, athletic and swimming instructions under proper guidance.

President Garland P. Webb presided at the meeting and eulogies were delivered for the late Senator William J. O'Brien and George W. Wallace. William A. Gibson was elected trustee to fill the vacancy created by the late Senator. A membership campaign has been inaugurated by Senator Elmer Johnson and council deputies for a large class of candidates to be initiated this fall.

N. Y. Philharmonic Plays Here Nov. 22

Visiting Washington for the first time in nine years, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will give a concert on Wednesday evening, November 22, in Constitution Hall, under the direction of John Barbirolli. The last time this orchestra was heard here was in December of 1930 during a tour under the direction of Arturo Toscanini. This year it is taking a fortnight's leave from New York to make a tour which will reach as far west as Chicago.

Stay-at-home Washingtonians have had to rely upon their radio sets for judgment of the direction ability of John Barbirolli, who became permanent conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in 1936 on a three-year contract. He was born in London, December 2, 1899, of Italian-French parentage. In his early youth he played violin and violoncello, and made his debut at the age of 11 in Queen's Hall. After the war he engaged, for a time, in quartet playing. In 1925 he organized his own chamber orchestra, thus beginning his experience in conducting.

This was followed by a position as conductor of the British National Opera touring the provinces. Recognition of his ability came rapidly, and by 1927 he was conducting concerts of both the London Symphony and the Royal Philharmonic Society in such distinguished company as Weingartner, Beecham and Casals. During several seasons he shared the conductor's desk with Bruno Walter and Tullio Serafin at Covent Garden. Later he became permanent conductor of the Scottish and Leeds symphony orchestras, and relinquished those posts when he was invited to this country.

For the Washington concert, Barbirolli promises two novelties: Jaromir Weinberger's Variations and Fugue on "Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree," which will have its premiere in New York on October 12, and Elger's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, op. 47. The other items announced are Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture and the fourth symphony of Brahms. Tickets are on sale at the National Symphony Orchestra box office.

Georgetown Group Plans One-Act Plays

Mask and Bauble Club, Aided by New Coach, Maps Fall Program

With the installation of a new coach of dramatics at Georgetown University, the Mask and Bauble Club announced yesterday that its plans for the first half year call for a series of one-act plays and at least one featured drama.

Prof. Theodore W. Plessner, S. J., who joined the faculty this summer as teacher of sophmore English and public speaking, is the new dramatic coach. He succeeds the late Arthur Behrens, who had directed the Mask and Bauble Club through several successful seasons. Mr. Behrens died soon after Georgetown's sesquicentennial celebration. His last act was to write and direct the sesquicentennial pageant which depicted high lights in 150 years of the university's history.

The dramatic club is organized this year under the leadership of Carl H. Watson, student president, and Prof. John S. Creaghan, S. J., who is continuing as faculty moderator and manager. Mr. Watson is the most experienced member of the club and gave an outstanding performance in the title role of John Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln" last season. Other officers of the club are James G. Foley, vice president; Dexter L. Hanley, treasurer; Raymond A. Doran, business manager; William Campo, publicity director, and Albert N. McGrath, production manager and technician.

Mr. Plessner was admitted to the Jesuit order seven years ago and during that time has had much experience in directing drama. He completed his course in philosophy last June at Woodstock College and obtained his degree from Georgetown. With Mr. Creaghan to help him, he is looking forward to a busy and successful season.

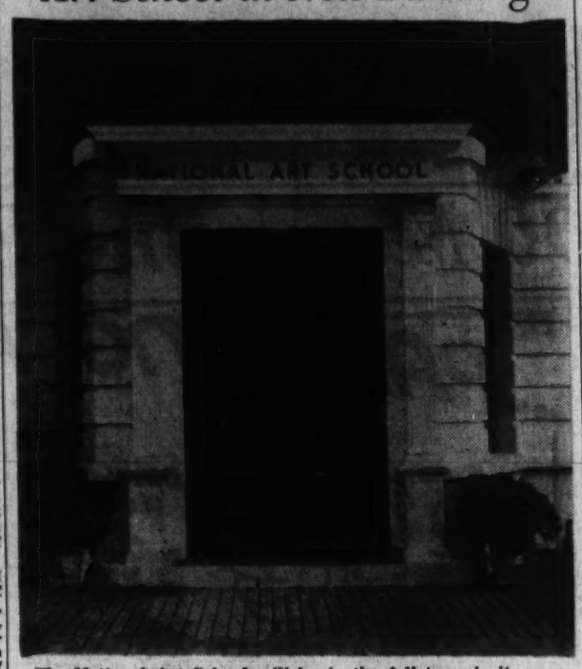
Discussing plans for the year, he said the club will swing back to one-act plays and depend also on local productions. Members of the club will be encouraged to write short plays and if these are satisfactory they will be produced. Last year the Mask and Bauble Club produced several professional Broadway hits, but present plans call for only one featured drama next December. The Georgetown club also will enter the Jesuit one-act-play contest next spring in competition with Fordham University, St. Joseph's, St. Peter's College and other Jesuit schools.

Organist to Present Symphony Andante

D. Sterling Wheelwright, organist and choir director of the Washington Chapel L. D. S., Sixteenth street and Columbia road, continues his free tri-weekly recitals at 3 p. m. Tomorrow's program includes the andante movement from Chaikovski's fifth symphony and the allegro movement from Maquaire's first organ symphony.

Liszt's "Liebestraum" No. 3, Nevin's "Will o' the Wisp" and Spencer's "Chinese Boy with a Bamboo Flute" constitute a group in the Wednesday program, which concludes with Widor's F major toccata. Edna C. Wheelwright, soprano, sings Schubert's "Ave Maria" and Schumann's "Devotion" on the Friday request program, while the organ numbers include Rubinstein's "Kamenoi-Ostrov" No. 22, Handel's "Ombra mai fu" and Kreisler's "Liebesfreud."

Art School in New Building



The National Art School will begin the fall term in its new home at 1503 Twenty-first street northwest, Tuesday. The additional space in the new building has been given over to more class and studio rooms and there is a large gallery for the exhibition of students' work

Gilbert and Sullivan Operas to Be Presented

For the benefit of Children's Hospital, two Gilbert and Sullivan light operas, "The Mikado" and "H. M. S. Pinafore," will be presented in Constitution Hall on October 12 and 13, under the direction of Max Fichandler, who is assisted in the stage management by David Niles. The entire net proceeds of the performances will be contributed toward the deficit of the hospital which gives free care to more than 6,000 ill and crippled children every year.

Detmar Poppen, one of the outstanding interpreters of Gilbert and Sullivan roles, will take the title role in "The Mikado," in which the part of Yum Yum will be sung by Ruth Altman, nationally known light opera star. John Cherry will be heard as Ko Ko, and the role of Katisha will be sung by Anne Yago McGuffey, of Washington. Among others in the cast are Charles Gallagher, John Eaton and Vera Muller. Tickets for both performances are available at the T. Arthur Smith Concert Bureau, 910 G street.

Columbus University Adds Law Class

To meet widespread requests for admission, Columbus University Law School tomorrow night will initiate a fourth section of the freshman law class, Dean John R. Fitzpatrick announced yesterday. Registrations for the new class will be accepted through tomorrow.

Scores of applicants were denied admission to the law school last week since accommodations were made for only three sections at the beginning of the fall semester. With applications continuing to pour in, Dean Fitzpatrick decided on the inauguration of the fourth section of the freshman law class.

Classes for the four sections are conducted in separate classrooms, the professors, subjects and hours being the same.

Dean James D. Cushman of the School of Accountancy announced the award of three-year scholasships to the following students chosen from Washington schools for academic excellence: Norman Bernstein, Roosevelt; Gloria M. Samaha, Holy Trinity; Irving Van Grack, Jewish Community Center; Joseph H. Blinkhorn, St. John's; Victor B. Brown, Gonzaga; Frank Feinsilber, Jewish Community Center; Frank Gantz, Central; Robert B. Montgomery, Virginia Chapter of the International Federation of Catholic Alumni, and John A. Quigley of St. Anthony.

PARADE of YOUTH

Averages 1,500 Magazine Sales a Month

No more stumbling down the dark aisles of movie theaters if the luminescent rug patented by a Philadelphia inventor becomes generally used. The rugs should be valuable assets to movie houses, but not as valuable as the carpets manufactured under the sponsorship of a seventeenth century French king. They were made with a base of gold thread!

U. N. T. will produce artificial underwater earthquakes for an expedition off islands of the South Central Pacific. The man-made quakes may aid science, but they probably won't turn up the usual objects that real tremors do. The only seemingly authentic report of a sea serpent, filed in British admiralty records, was the result of a submarine quake. Rudyard Kipling and the officers of a British warship were on the bridge when a sort of waterspout off Africa brought up the body of a huge, red-backed monster.

Another addition to Florida's diversified agricultural industry! This time it's the aloe, a fruit widely used in making medicines. The juice of the aloe, though little known to the general public, is beneficial in disorders ranging from indigestion to diabetes. It even heals X-ray burns. But the aloe isn't content with mere medicinal versatility. Its fibers make excellent plasterers' brushes!

The world's most cautious beast, the African warthog, is being introduced to Americans. Specimens have been brought from Somaliland to a Chicago museum. The curious, wart faced animals always back into their homes. Generally conceded to be the ugliest of all animals, the warthog has one characteristic which should endear him to veterinarians. He seldom has more than the last pair of molars in each jaw—four teeth in all!

Tragedy has dropped in again on a ship launching. When a British aircraft carrier was due to coast down the ways in Belfast, Ireland, it broke loose ahead of schedule, and a flying timber killed a spectator. Strange things have occurred at launchings. Ships have been known to slide down into the water and keep on going—to the bottom. And one lady christener hurled the traditional bottle of champagne at the ship's bow and scored a clean hit—on a bystander's head!

A 153-pound topaz, one of the biggest jewels in the world, has been added to the collection of the Smithsonian Institute in Washington. The topaz might aptly be called the "chameleon gem." A French jeweler, nearly two centuries ago, discovered that yellow Brazilian topaz, when heated, changes to pink. Consequently, practically all pink topaz worn as jewelry has been disguised by that method!

Boy Tops in Everything He's Tackled

Americans have a word for Herbert McDonald. It's "go-getter." When he was 14, he was the nation's outstanding magazine salesman; in high school and junior college he starred in three sports; he was student body president of the world's largest junior college, and he's the leading pitcher and batter in an eight-team softball league!

Eleven years ago, when he was 9, Herb listened to the manager of a magazine sales agency say: "Work hard and some day you might sell more magazines than any other boy in the United States."

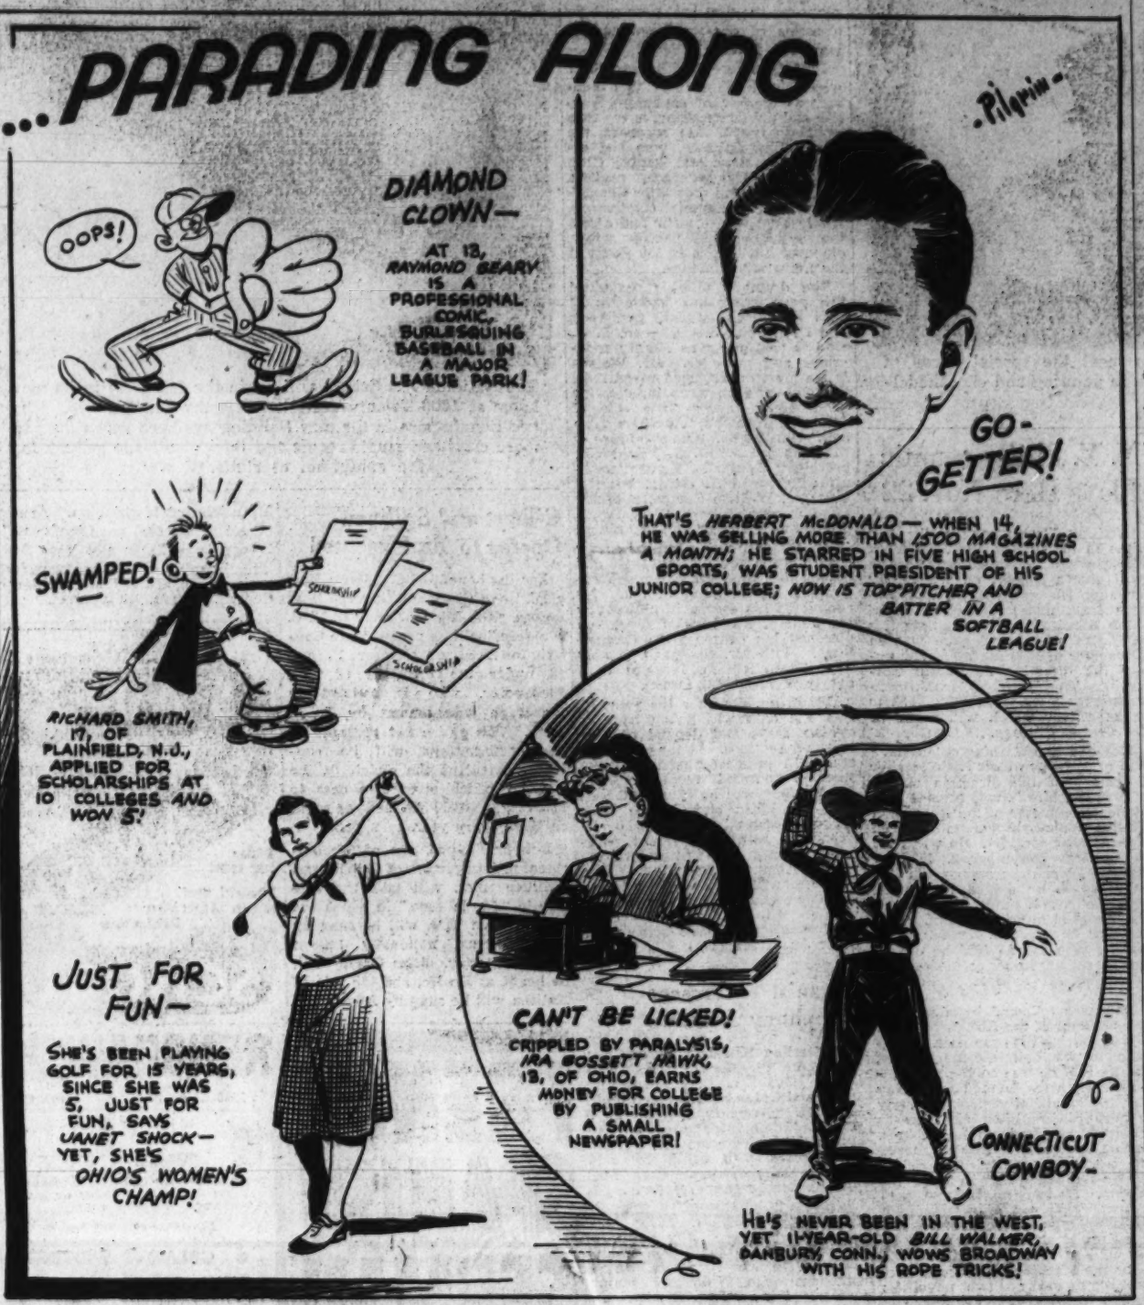
That was a challenge. Herb worked until he earned enough money to buy a bicycle. That allowed him to widen his field, see more prospects. And five years later—handling one weekly, two monthlies—he was not only selling more magazines than any other boy, but for five months he averaged the amazing total of 1,500 a month, more than anyone else ever had sold before or ever has since!

When he entered high school, Herb turned his attention to studies and sports. He won three letters in football, two in basketball, four in track, three in baseball, one in tennis and won his league championship at the mile the first year out.

While attending Pasadena, Calif., Junior College and becoming the outstanding student leader, he was also playing softball at night. In four years he's won 31 while losing 8; he's hurled 9 no-hit games; he pitched both ends of a double-header and both were no-hit games, and he holds the league strike-out record!

"My ambitions are to make good either in advertising or in correcting child delinquency," he writes Parade from 1136 N. Hill street, Pasadena, Calif. Because he's Herb McDonald, he's already got a start in both fields, having been advertising manager of his junior college publication, and working with his local Y. M. C. A.

...PARADING ALONG



"Overwhelmed"

Richard Smith wanted to go to college on a scholarship, so just to make sure, he applied to 10 different schools. He's going to college on a schoarship all right. He was offered five!

"I was a little overwhelmed at winning all of them and definitely amazed," he says at 2 Albert street, Plainfield, N. J. "You see, I never expected to get them all."

And Richard still can't account for the flood of honors. "I lay my scholastic ability to several factors," he writes, "primarily inheritance. Also, I have attended about 15 different schools run by all kinds of systems and that was very broadening."

Knows the Ropes

If a rope had vocal chords, Bill Walker could make it sit up and talk. As it is, he can do just about everything else with it. At 11, he's toured several New England States as a rope-twirler and even brought down the house at a Broadway show in New York City.

Bill's father taught him some tricks, others he picked up himself. He twirls one rope over his head, jumps through another spinning around his body. He can even twirl three at once—one in his mouth.

His father, a World War veteran, introduced him to Elsie Janis, stage star who was known as the "Sweetheart of the A. E. F." She introduced him to Broadway at a special show she staged. And critics wrote his act was as good as any they had ever seen in professional rodeo shows.

Yet, Bill writes Parade from 57 Lincoln avenue, Danbury, Conn., "I have never been in the West." He hopes to go there soon, though. "I have been auditioned by three moving picture companies and expect to hear from one soon," he adds.

Ball-less Baseball

"He imitates a pitcher doing everything a pitcher would do on the mound. He fights with umpires, back up, plays and catches a pop fly. He does this without any help and without a ball!"

Somebody crazy? Not at all. That's Frank Geary telling about his 13-year-old brother, Raymond or—to be familiar—"Spinach." Spinach's burning ambition is to be the successor to Al Schacht, baseball's most famous clown.

If he keeps on the way he's started, he probably will be. He's already been paid for performances in Brooklyn's mammoth Ebbetts Field and at two other parks in the New York City area. He lives at 86-15 Eighty-sixth street, Woodhaven, N. Y.

His nickname? Oh, that was hung on him because one of his stunts is to take two strikes at an imaginary ball, then pull a spinach can out of his pocket, gulp some imaginary spinach and then swat an imaginary home run!

Not Serious

"I don't like to take the game seriously," Janet Shock says. "I only play for the fun of it." Yet, she's women's golfing champ of Ohio, only girl on the varsity team of Denison University and three times queen of her local—Dayton—links!

"My front yard is composed of 36 holes," she writes Parade from Route 7, Dayton. "My father is the manager of the Community Club and we live at the course."

That's why Janet has been playing since she was 5. That means that now she's a veteran of 15 years on the links. For the last nine of those years she's been entering tournaments.

Comeback

Two years ago a victim of infantile paralysis, doomed never to play with boys again, possibly never to have the college education he so much wanted. Today, publisher of a thriving monthly paper which will pay his way through school! That's the story of Ira Gossett Hawk, 13.

Ira started the Salem Echo just as a pastime to wile away the long hours spent in a wheelchair. He published two issues and told his friends that would be all. But they weren't satisfied, urged him to carry it on.

People sent subscriptions, advertisements. He was given a new mimeograph and typewriter by the manufacturers. So he got back to work. And he's built his subscription list almost up to his goal of 1,000!

"I want my Salem Echo to help me through college," he writes from Plainview Farm, Lynchburg, Ohio. "I must have a good education because I will never be well like other people."

Ira's been making progress in his fight for health, though. He can walk now with the aid of a brace and crutches. He gets around well enough to take part in 4-H club activities and has even been elected president of his local group!

Girl of the Week

Who—Helen Crlenkovich, 18.

Why—Three years ago, she couldn't dive at all, apparently had no natural ability. She suffered setbacks and injuries but this summer Helen Crlenkovich won the national diving championship!

Where—San Francisco, Calif. (She lives at 179 Caselli avenue.)

Helen Crlenkovich

When Helen first went to Coach Phil Patterson for a swimming try-out all she had was determination. A poor swimmer, she could dive only from the side of the pool. But the mentor liked her determination. "She was full of ambition and the desire to make good and I didn't care to drop her from membership," he says.

Helen had had that desire ever since she learnd to swim. Then she saw graceful Georgia Coleman, former Olympic star, in action and vowed some day she would be that good.

"She learned by hard work," says Mr. Patterson. "She made it her business to get the movements correct."

Once Helen got the hang of it, she moved ahead. Second in a sectional championship. First in a Pacific Coast tourney. National Junior champ. More hard work prepping for the national women's event. An accident. Helen tore her head open, the wound requiring three stitches.

That didn't stop her. She continued practice under a doctor's care, and entered the meet. Despite the tormenting pain, she finished fourth. That was two years ago. Last year she moved up to second.

Fun Column

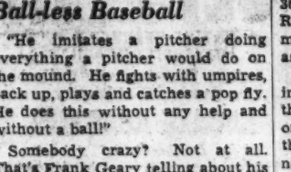
Lyin'-Hearted

"Yes, sir. I cut Dempsey to ribbons once."

"Yeah? I didn't know you were a fighter."

"I'm not—I'm a barber."

Grid Graft



"Did that star halfback graduate last year?"

"Well, they offered him a raise, so he renewed his contract."

Bouncing Baby

A bantam auto was speeding down the road. Every fifty yards or so it would leap into the air, then go on. Finally a policeman stopped the driver.

"Say, what's the matter with that thing?" he barked.

"Nothing, officer, it's me. I've got the hiccoughs."

Squibbie

Hold tight, Paraders, and while you're hanging on read this week's Squibbie, submitted by Charles B. Carlisle, Chappells, S. C. Harry may be wacky now, but Charles isn't, because he gets a Mystery Prize for his efforts.

LETTERS

Doubter

Parade: I would like to know very much whether or not the letters you send to Paraders really reach them or not. Those names and addresses could very easily be made up. I would like to know whether this thing called "Parade of Youth" is on the level or not.

PAUL H. RYON.
4500 Watkins avenue,
Bethesda, Md.

We've always thought so.—Ed.

Come Again

Parade: I wish you would answer a question for me. Are we allowed to put our names in Help! Help! more than once?

BETTY O'MEARA.
2002 Twelfth street, northeast,
Washington, D. C.

Paraders may send in as many different pleas as they wish. But please remember that Parade receives each week about twice as many items as it can print, so give others a chance.—Ed.

Unlaxed

Parade: I sincerely appreciate your allowing me to advertise myself as an amateur graphologist in your Letters Column. Your nation-wide circulation is stupendous! To those 20 or 30 people who have not received any answer from me, the reason is lack of a self-addressed, stamped envelope. And now, using a scrap of your paper, I'd like to advertise myself as being no longer in the heretofore mentioned business. You see, I'm working now, and after hours I just like to unlax. Does anyone sympathize?

MARIAN A. BUNNELL.
26 Comstock place,
E. Hartford, Conn.

Yodeler

Parade: I sincerely agree with Readeress Johnson, of Utah, concerning yodeling. I have been singing and yodeling for about eight years and have not regretted it yet. I have done it on the radio many times with my older sister, Betty, and we received many compliments. Are there any more yodeling Paraders? HELEN KLIMA.
R. 19 Lindeneau,
New Brunswick, N. J.

Brass Band

Parade: If that upsnootie Eleanor Monaghon thinks she is so superior to us jitterbugs, she's nuts . . . The Mazurka in B Flat is not pushed aside and forgotten, for you hear it at many concerts . . . She'll just have to grin and bear swing . . . If music was conceit, she'd have a brass band . . . We are 16 and sophomores in high school and our report cards are all A's and B plusses and we'll wager we have more fun than she.

BETTY and LA DEAN SPENDLOVE.
324 Peachtree avenue,
Hurricane, Utah.

From Nigeria

Parade: While reading through your paper, I was much moved by the words in the Letters Column. I am an African. I am delighted in your paper. I got those of December, 1938 and January, 1939 from a friend. I wish to be one of the youths writing in the paper if your laws or creed permit it.

MELCHIADES OLADIMEJI ELUSOJI.
76 Tokunboh street,
Lagos, Nigeria, W. C. A.

Plane Talk

Parade: As for Mary Grimes, I think she's nuts. Plane Facts is swell. I wish you could give it a larger space. CLAIRE SMITH.
49 Newton street,
Hartford, Conn.

Parade: I agree with Mary Grimes about the baseball column, but I disagree about taking out Plane Facts. Please don't take it out.

NANCY LEWIS NEWSOM.
32 Waterside lane,
Clinton, Conn.

Out-of-Town Boy

Parade: I have just read Parade for about the fifth time and I sure do enjoy it. I wish they had something like it in a Chicago newspaper. By the way, I come from Chicago and am just having a grand time down here in the sunny South. To tell the absolute truth, I like Charlotte better than I do Chicago. I hope that no Chicago people will read this. I am 18. PAUL VINROOT.
8927 Blackstone,
Chicago, Ill.

No High-Hat

Parade: Please answer this one question for me—at least, try to. Why are Paraders west of the Mississippi river so swell-headed and conceited that they can't answer a letter from a Parader in South Carolina? Surely the Midwest, as well as the West, is loaded down with wealth and is of value to the U. S., but so is the South—and we aren't high-hatting everyone.

CALDWELL HAMILTON.
212 E. Black street,
Rock Hill, S. C.

Green Pastures

Parade: The country is a beautiful place, green pastures, roaming hills, fields of tobacco and corn and many other things. The country is a healthful place, plenty of exercise such as fishing, working and swimming, plenty of sunshine, and plenty of green vegetables to eat.

PAUL W. WATTS.

By the United Press.

South Bend, Ind., Sept. 30.—A sharply angled place-kick by another one of those unheralded substitute quarterbacks of Notre Dame today conquered Purdue, 3 to 0, before the largest opening day crowd in the 51 years of intercollegiate football at Notre Dame.

Throttled on the ground during the entire first half by Purdue's hard-charging defense, Notre Dame finally thrust it back with a series of deadly punts early in the third period and laid the groundwork for the only offensive thrill of the day for the 40,000 fans packed into the brown stone stadium.

Kelleher the Hero

John Charles Kelleher, substitute Irish quarterback for two years, raced from the bench when the Notre Dame attack suddenly stalled on Purdue's 8-yard line after a march of 28 yards. On fourth down—Kelleher's first play—he kicked the ball squarely between the goal posts from a difficult angle on the 16-yard line.

It was the second and last time the Irish, leading candidate for the mythical national championship, penetrated deeply enough into Purdue territory to make a scoring threat.

In the second period, Halfback Lou Zontini missed an attempted placement from the 17-yard line after he and Steve Sitko had lugged the ball from Purdue's 35-yard line to the 10.

Punting Duel

All through the first half Notre Dame's Bob Saggau and Milt Piepul drove Purdue back with siege-gun punts, but not until the third period, when Saggau booted one 48 yards to Purdue's 12-yard line, did the indirect assault produce results.

Jack Brown, of Purdue, kicked back and Sitko scooped the ball and raced 18 yards to Purdue's 34. Zontini cut 11 yards through center and 4 more through rightguard. Joe Thesing started around his own left end, hurdled Brown, who had been sent sprawling by Sitko's crisp block in the open field, and squirmed down to the 5-yard line before he was tripped and fell out of bounds.

There Purdue stiffened, held Sag-

Diagram above depicts a play that occurred in second period of Maryland-Hampden-Sydney. Boya's pass, intended for Bernie Ulman, was hurried and went far wide of its mark and into the hands of Frank Sullivan, Tigers' center, who caught the ball but dropped it. The referee ruled incomplete pass

Big Pershing and Little Joe Have Hand In All Four Touchdowns; Maryland Shows Rugged, Speedy Eleven in Opening Game

By Jack Munhall.

Big, swashbuckling Pershing Mondorff and frail, speedy litle Joe Murphy formed an odd but terrifying backfield combination for Maryland against Hampden-Sydney yesterday as they led an unusually fast and rugged Terrapin eleven to a 26-to-0 opening victory at College Park.

Mondorff, reveling in his new role of a triple threat back, did a great job of line smashing and forward passing, and Murphy, running up to his reputation as Southern Conference dash champion, turned in superlative performances that left 3,000 fans with the impression that Coach Dobson's luck has changed for the better.

Murphy, still a bit green, nevertheless showed promise of becoming Maryland's best climax runner since Frank Guckeyson and also passed surprisingly well. Mondorff, a converted blocking back who is returning to the line-up after a year's absence due to illness, was fully as valuable as Murphy both carrying the ball or throwing it, usually to End Francis Beamer.

Between the two of them they had a hand in all of Maryland's four touchdowns which were scored two in the first period and one in each of the second and fourth quarters. Murphy personally attended to the

College of Pacific Upsets California's Golden Bears, 14-0

Berkeley, Calif., Sept. 30 (INS).—Coach A. A. Stagg's Bengals from the college of the Pacific scored a startling upset this afternoon when they beat the California Golden Bears, 6 to 0.

STAGG

The Bengals won the second game of the opening day doubleheaders, designed to give all the Bears a chance to play. California beat the California Aggies, 32 to 14, in the opener, after trailing, 14 to 0, at half time.

Three fumbled punts by Tony Firpo, California safety man in the Pacific game, kept the Bears in their own territory for the greater part of the afternoon. They never got inside the Pacific 30.

Green Wave Nips Clemson By 7-6 Score

By the Associated Press

New Orleans, Sept. 30.—The Tulane Green Wave launched its bid for national acclaim today before 25,000 spectators with a narrow and unconvincing victory, 7 to 6, over Clemson College, whose superior generalship gave it a lead at half time.

Red Kellogg saved the game for Tulane near the end of the third quarter after Gloden got away from Clemson's 25-yard line for an electrifying 39-yard-run through a wide hole opened up by Tulane's right forward wall.

Kellogg Converts

Almost unaided, the great Tulane halfback began punching right and left in efforts which netted 24 yards. With the ball on the goal line Kellogg, behind a powerhouse, shoved it over and converted.

A fighting Clemson team put the ball into touchdown position at the end of the first quarter following a brief passing attack. Kellogg broke through to take one misdirected aerial but the ball went to Clemson for interference.

Trexler, substituting for Timmons, found one of the rare Tulane line's holes and picked up 14 yards. Then McFadden rifled a 20-yard pass to Blalock, who had only to lope 8 yards for the touchdown.

McFadden's effort for the point was smothered.

Clemson opened up another aerial attack in the fourth, but McFadden's campaign was ended when he was smothered by three Greenies.

Outrushed throughout, Clemson held an effective superiority throughout the first half by superior generalship and the accurate quick-kicking of McFadden, who was con-

Navy Defeats Indian Eleven In Debut, 31-6

William and Mary Is Tartar in 1st Half; 13,000 See Battle

Special Dispatch to The Post

Annapolis, Sept. 30.—William and Mary College sent its usual scrappy team to Annapolis today, played the Naval Academy Midshpmen to a 6 to 6 standoff in the first half, but a fast and rip-snorting attack of the heavier Navy lads in the later stages bowled it in defeat, 31 to 6.

Replete with open play, the game kept some 13,000 fans keyed to a high pitch throughout, the only disturbing element being the intense heat.

Bergner Missing

The game marked Navy's 1939 debut, also the inaugural of a new coaching regime, headed by Maj. Emery E. Larson, U. S. Marine Corps, a former midshipman who starred on Navy football and lacrosse teams. While errors of commission and omission were noted in the battle, the net result augured well for a successful season.

The Middies entered the contest sans the services of Capt. Al Bergner, stalwart tackle, and five other regulars, who are nursing injuries. This undoubtedly proved a handicap, but a strong and representative aggregation trotted on the turf of Farragut Field to defend the Blue and Gold. Aside from this, the Navy mentors started their strongest combination against the invaders, only to find after the early

Cadet's Touchdown In Last Minute Clinches Victory

By the Associated Press

West Point, N. Y., Sept. 30.—Army's football power house had to use all its volts today to turn back the threat of a sturdy Furman University eleven, and when dusk cloaked Michie Stadium the 7,000 spectators who watched the Cadets turn in a 16-to-7 victory weren't quite sure whether Army is the national threat it is painted or whether Furman was a sleeper.

The latter idea predominated, however, as the Southerners, with a bevy of fine backs and a concrete line, carried the fight to the Soldiers a goodly share of the time, and saw drive after drive of their own fade when pay dirt loomed, the threats often killed by their own misplays.

Playing alert, aggressive ball and showing a mechanical perfection on offense, Furman kept the hearts of the 7,000 in their throats until the last 45 seconds, when a final Army touchdown clinched the issue.

Scores Bunched in 2d

The other scores all came in the second quarter. Late in the first period Army, with some sharp running by Jere Maupin, drove to the Furman 4.

On the second play of the second period, Maupin dove over for a touchdown, and Art Frontczak place-kicked the extra point. Shortly after, when an Army drive had been stymied on the Furman 8,

Havre de Grace, Md., Sept. 30.—Under a tight grip, W. L. Brann's mighty Challedon flashed across the finish line five lengths in front of his nearest rival to win the $15,000 added Havre de Grace Handicap and take the lead for the Nation's horses in money won for 1939. Splashing through the mud in almost the exact manner in which he won the Preakness last May, Challedon passed ambitious leaders in the stretch and was "crying to run" more after the finish, the outrider having to assist Jockey Georgie Woolf in bringing the Frederick County Express back to the judges' stand.

"I could have done anything I wanted with this colt," said Woolf after the race. "He could have won today had the race been a mile or a mile and a half. As it was I let him run only for a sixteenth of a mile."

Only five horses marched postward with Challedon. While many trainers in the original field wanted to meet him on a fast track, the overnight rains which turned the track into a sea of mud changed their minds.

Porter's Mite, conqueror of Challedon in the mud in a previous race, finished next to last today and Nedayr, running in the colors of Belmont Park, N. Y., Sept. 30 (AP). William Woodward's 3-year-old colt Johnstown, regarded as the champion of his age until his crushing defeat in the Arlington classic last July, has been permanently retired, his owner announced in a statement issued here before 2 o'clock this afternoon. Johnstown was scratched out of the mile and five furlong Lawrence realization, which was no surprise with the track still wet and slow from overnight rain, a condition unfavorable to the Belair bullet.

Mrs. Payne Whitney's Hash, favored at 11 to 20, after lagging in the early running of the realization drew away from Chip in after straightening out in the stretch to win in the good time of 2:42 3-5.

Mr. Woodward explained that the colt has not been "right" since the Dawyer at Aqueduct last June, and that the colt had since met with a series of reverses which mad it advisable to retire him. Johnstown this year won seven of his nine starts for earnings of $137,895, and last year scored in seven out of 12 races, earning $31,420. His total is $169,310. Pirates Name Frankie Frisch Pilot

By International News Service

Pittsburgh, Sept. 30. — Frankie Frisch, the sparkling "Fordham Flash" of yesteryear, tonight was named manager of the Pittsburgh Pirates baseball team for the next two years.

Bill Benswanger, president of the Bucs, announced Frisch had accepted terms via the long-distance telephone this morning. He refused, however, to divulge any of the terms other than it was a two-year agreement.

A contract likely will be signed in New York Tuesday when Frisch will meet with Benswanger and Harold Joseph (Pie) Traynor, whom he succeeds as Pirate manager. All three will be in Gotham to attend the league's annual draft meeting.

Club officials hinted the announcement would have been made earlier except for some haggling over the length of the contract. Frisch, it was disclosed, sought a three-year pact, while Benswanger insisted it be for one year, in keeping with the club's policy.

A compormise on two years was reached in the phone call with the veteran infielder who is now in Boston where he was attached to a radio station broadcasting baseball games. Frisch recently severed connections with the New England broadcasting network, leading to immediate speculation that he had been signed to pilot the wobbling Buccaneers.

Benswanger declared that three others were considered for the post, but that Frisch had been his first choice because he is "an experienced, aggressive, intelligent and alert leader."

He declined to disclose the names of the others mentioned for the job but said one was a major leaguer and the other two were in the minors. t was believed that Jimmy Wilson, at present a coach with the National League champs, the Cincinnati Reds, was the major league man involved.

Seattle, Sept. 30.—Pittsburgh's Panthers, who traveled the 2,600 miles from Pittsburgh to Seattle by plane, took to the air again today, completing 12 of 18 passes for an easy 27 to 6 victory over the University of Washington Huskies in an intersectional football opener before 25,000 fans.

The Pitt aerial circus took command in the first 5 minutes but it looked for a while in the third period as though the weary Panther airmen were heading for the hangar for repairs.

Lightning-fast backfield work by Dick Cassiano, only remaining member of Pitt's 1938 "dream backfield," and Ben Kish, rugged 200-pound quarterback, was a deciding factor for the Easterners. The Pitt attack wasted no time getting upder way, either by land or by air, and "quickie" passes had the Husky defenders dizzy.

Pitt Scores

Washington took the opening kickoff and punted immediately. Starting on their own 31, the Panthers interspersed long ground gainers with passes to travel 69 yards for their first score. It came on a fourth down 20-yard pass from Emil Narick to Joe Rettinger, who caught the ball in the end zone.

Partly blocked punts by lanky End John Dickinson led to Pitt's second and fourth touchdowns. Dickinson recovered one on the husky 44 in the second period, and Cassiano went over nine plays later.

Blocked Punt

In the final quarter Dickinson blocked another punt by Dean McAdams in the Husky end zone, the ball zooming skyward and coming to rest in the clutches of Tackle Ted Konetsky on the Husky 2. Kish went over three plays later.

The final Pitt score came in the last quarter. Center Dick Fullerton set it up with a 44-yard pass interception, running to the Husky 9. Cassiano passed to Kish for the score. Rettinger converted twice, Kish once.

Big Green Eleven Overrides St. Lawrence, 41-9

Hanover, N. H., Sept. 30 (U.P.).—Dartmouth's "Big Green" warriors opened their football season today with a 41-to-9 victory over little St. Lawrence, scoring in every period before 6,000 fans.

St. Lawrence scored only in the fourth, after Coach Earl Blaik had sent in Dartmouth's third-stringers. Left Halfback Bill Hutchinson starred for Dartmouth, passing to one touchdown and scoring two others.

Blaik's second team played the entire second period and produced the two most spectacular scoring plays of the day. Buford Hayden sprinted 55 yards for a touchdown and later took a pass from Jim Bauman for a 41-yard scoring play.

Yankees Rated 3-1 Favorites Over Reds in World Series

Reds' Spirit, Teamwork Only Hope

Odds Are Mere 4-1 Against N. Y. Taking 4 Straight; Young Cincy Hurlers Inept

By the Associated Press

New York, Sept. 30.—Like the pup that chased an automobile and finally caught it, the Cincinnati Reds are in the World Series—and no one seems to know why.

Outside their own select set, the Rhinelanders aren't rated one tiny chance of knocking off one of the greatest ball clubs of all time, which, to date, has shown no apparent weakness—on offense or defense or pitching, or in the hot dog sale in the stands.

Just to make the point clear, the odd-makers today established the Yankees favorites at 1 to 3 to make new baseball history by winning their fourth straight World Championship right on top of their eleventh American League pennant since 1921. In fact, the bookies will give you no more than 4-1 if you like Marse Joe McCarthy's maulers to repeat their four-straight conquest of the Cubs last fall.

Reds Pack Confidence

On the other hand, the Reds, full of fight and a lot of team spirit, are carrying a world of confidence into the series. Paced by the heroic hurling arms of Paul Derringer and Bucky Walters, who won 52 games between them this season, the Reds have it all figured out. They're certain they'll break even in the opening two games, scheduled for Yankee Stadium Wednesday and Thursday, and that, when they return to their own back ward for the next three outings, starting Saturday, they'll take the ronx Brigade apart. (And Mr. Gus Q. Fan Brises to remark it would be a good trick even if they don't do it.)

ff Out in Cincinnati, the good burghers at long last have something to celebrate and they mean to give out right. The town is wild over the boys. And, since the memory of their last world series—against the "Black Sox"—left a bad taste all these years, the good burghers mean to be avenged, whether it's the Yanks or the tenth avenue alleycats.

Yankees Are "It"

However, they still pay off on the club with the most runs at the end of the ninth inning, and the anks are lop-sided favorites to be "IT."

Even without Lefty Gomez, whose injured side muscles may keep him away, the Yanks have the pitching. Red Ruffing, Monte Pearson and Bump Hadley all have had successful World Series experience, and then there's a set of youngsters who have ben exceptionally hot this season—Steve Sundra, undefeated in 11 starts; Atley Donald, who rolled up 12 straight; Marius Russo, a long, slim southpaw, and Spud Chandler, the former Georgia footballer.

The Bronx infield is second to none in the big leagues, and may yet go down with the greatest of all time. The outfield, where roams Joe DiMaggia, would make any manager's appetite improve. The catching is done by long Bill Dickey, generally regarded as the best there is, now that Mickey Cochrane is gone and Gabby Hartnett has decided he's too old for that sort of thing.

Young Hurlers Ineffective

Against this array, the Reds pit a pitching staff made up exclusively of Derringer and Walters. The Reds' young hurlers just haven't shown the form they displayed last year—fellows like Johnny Vander Meer and Whitey Moore and the eccentric Lefty Lee Grissom, all with capabilities but with no more control than a runaway horse. Junior Thompson may be rated a chance, but Junior lacks all kinds of experience. Only a year ago he was pitching Class B ball—and there's something about the World Series that usually gets the youngsters to choking up.

The Rhineland infield has been made and re-made until it resembles a bowl of hash—without the poached egg. Buck McCormick on first is as good a ball player as will come down the pike any time, but the second-base combination of Lonnie Frey and Billy Myers have been playing way over their heads all season.

Cincinnati Can Only See Rhinelanders

By the Associated Press

Cincinnati, Sept. 30.—Unable to talk it over with the boys in person because they are waiting for it to quit raining in Pittsburgh, the curbstone prophets devoted their time today to figuring out ways for the Cincinnati Reds to take the New York Yankees in the forthcoming World Series.

The more they figured, the more complicated the problem became, and among the more vehement faithful it resolved itself in this: "Paul Derringer and Bucky Walters can be counted on for two games and maybe all four and then there's Gene Thompson."

Since this added up to five games, one more than either team must win, and since the Yankees aren't going to be taken in four games anyway the discussion would be up to where it started.

How About the Yanks

But here is something for the Yankees to consider: The regular Cincinnati team, including Pitchers Derringer, Walters and Thompson, is hitting a neat .296.

You can include those pitchers. They don't carry a bat just because the rules require it.

Bucky, of course, is one of baseball's real hitting pitchers. In the course of winning 27 games, he has been up 118 times and hit safely 39 for an average of .331.

Twenty-nine of the hits were singles but there were eight doubles, a triple and a homer. You don't dare pitch a grapefruit to him.

Derringer has 23 hits for 110 tries, or .209. This is nothing sensational, but count on Paul to lay down a buntor float out a long sacrifice fly when it's needed. Thompson's 45 trips to the plate have given him 11 hits, including a double, for .244.

1,517 Hits For Season

The whole regular team, to achieve its .296 batting average, has run up 1,517 hits in 5,11 times at bat so far this year. Of the 228 have been doubles, 44 triples, and 98 homers. They may run that homer total to an even century in tomorrow's double-header against Pittsburgh.

Frank McCormick, of course, is the big man, with .331 on 206 hits in 623 tries. Further, he leads the league in runs batted in with 127. Ival Goodman's 149 in 486 tries gave him .320. Lonnie Frey follows with .290 and Ernie Lombardi and Bill Werber with .286.

The others, in order, are, Billy Myers .277, Wally erger .250, and Harry BCraft .255.

And just in case Lombardi gets tired, there's Willard, Hershberger to take over his catching. Willard, little guy though he is, is hitting .343.

However, all this is against National League pitching. What it means against the best of the American League will be known in a few days.

Nats Defeat Macks, 9 to 5, In Slugfest

Special Dispatch to The Post

Philadelphia, Sept. 30.—Doubles and triples bounced from the bats of the Washington Club in profusion this afternoon and the Athletics went down to a 9-5 defeat in a free-hitting contest.

Young Joe Haynes, right-handed rookie of the Nats, experienced little difficulty in registering a victory despite the fact that he yielded 11 hits to the A's. The Nats knocked Lynn Nelson out of the box in four innings and continued their assault on Chubby Dean.

The Nats gave Haynes a commanding lead, scoring a pair of runs in four of the first five innings to establish an 8-1 lead. The A's scored four runs in the last three innings in a futile attempt to pull the game out of the fire.

The Nats didn't dally with Nelson. In the first inning, West singled and Wright and Travis followed with three-baggers. Wright's blow was a long drive to right-center and Travis' was a smash to left-center. They netted the Nats two runs.

Two-base hits were the theme of a third-inning attack by the Nats. Leip led off with a double to left, and Lewis scored him with a double to right. Lewis scored when Travis' grounder took a freak hop over Lodigiani's head for a single.

Jimmy ernon opened the fourth with a two-bagger to center, and singles by Haynes and Leip produced two more runs to boost the Nats' lead to 6-1. In the fifth against Dean they scored another pair after Travis made his third hit, a single to left. Bloodworth drew a walk, and Lodigiani presented the Nats with a pair of runs by Muffing Jake Early's pop fly.

Three straight singles by Haynes, Lewis and Wright, produced the last Washington run, in the sixth inning.

Brancato's home run into the lower leftfield stands fetched the A's a run in the opening inning, but they didn't get another until the seventh when they scored two. Single runs by the A's in the eighth and ninth served only to reduce the Nats' huge lead.

Philadelphia, Sept. 30 (AP).—A driving attack headed by a quartet of sophomores gave St. Joseph's a 40 to 13 victory over Monticello A. and M., of Arkansas, in its opening game before a crowd of 3,000 today.

Harry Seltzer, sophomore halfback, led the scoring with two touchdowns, scoring the second on a 35-yard run. Sophomores Bob McKee, Joe Monte and Jerry Reinburg and Fred Dollenberg, a senior, contributed the other scores.

Monticello put up a game fight, travelling 70 yards on forward passes for its first touchdown.

Arthur G. Bishop, president of the D. C. Building and Loan Association, will toss the first ball down Chevy Chase Alleys tomorrow when the new bowling league of the association gets under way. Eight teams, representing different firms, have signified their intention of competing. Opening ceremonies are listed for 8 p. m.

Oxon Hill, Md., Ace In County Playoff

One of the hottest baseball league playoffs in this vicinity gets under way today when Oxon Hill nine, winners of the first half of the Prince Georges County League, entertains Maryland Aces starting at 2:30. The Aces, second-half winners, are expected to hurl "Lefty" Clements, while Manager Bob Talley will probably counter with his big league prospect, Johnny McFadden. D. C. umpires will handle the game.

Maryland Beats Hampten-Sydney

first six-pointer, scooting right end from the 10 after a poor kick by Hampden-Sydney's Syd Walden had given the Terps possession on the 15-yard line.

The second Maryland touchdown was the climax of a 31-yard drive, sparked by Murphy's passing and running, and was scored from the 2-yard line by John Boyda who started the game at the tailback position.

Then midway of the second stanza Mondorff, replacing Boyda, together with a new Maryland backfield, took over the scoring burden for the Terps. With Maryland having the ball on its 25 a reverse, Vernon Miller to Bernie Ulman, picked up 18 yards and Mondorff passed to End Frank Dwyer for 8 more to move to the Tigers' 49.

Successive passes, Mondorff to Ulman and Mondorff to Dwyer ate up 34 yards and gained the Terps another first down on the 15. Mondorff then hit center to advance to the 10 before he led interference for Miller who circled right end for the third Maryland touchdown.

Leading 19-0 Maryland substituted freely throughout the third period and apparently was not hungry for further scores, but early in the fourth period Mondorff re-entered the game to cap his successful day by pacing a 72-yard sustained drive which culminated in his pay-dirt pass to Beamer.

Longest Scoring Drive

Mondorff's hand in this, Maryland's longest scoring drive of the afternoon, was briefly: From the 37 to where Jack Warfield, third-string Terps' quarterback had gained 9 yards, Mondorff made it a first down. On the next play he worked a fake reverse with John Cordyack to run 15 yards for the second successive first down on the Hampden-Sydney 43.

He passed to Beamer for still another first on the 19, picked up a fourth first down on the six with a plunge at tackle. And then, after an offside penalty had set Maryland back to the 11, he passed to Beamer down the middle for the final touchdown. Mondorff then place-kicked the extra point. The other Maryland conversion, after the first touchdown, was by Boyda's place kick.

As far as enemy scouts were concerned, Maryland showed little, sticking to straight-away tactics, with the exception of numerous passes. Its best single ground gainer was a simple reverse to the weak side.

Many Players Used

Coach Dobson used almost every player on his small squad with general success. Vernon Miller, quarterback, and Ulman, halfback, promoted from last year's junior varsity, were the outstanding backfield reserves.

Yanks, Bosox Split as Sundra Meets Defeat

By the Associated Press

New York, Sept. 30.—The Yankees and the Boston Red Sox divided a doubleheader today that may have been meaningless to the two teams, but meant the first defeat of the season for Steven Sundra.

The Yankee righthander who had won 11 ni a row this season was the victim of a 4 to 2 Boston uprisnig in the nightcap, which was closed by darkness after seven innings.

The champions won the first game 5 to 4 on the mragin of Bill Dickey's twenty-fourth homer in the seventh inning.

Jack Wilson held New York to five hits in the second game and Ted Williams put the Sox in front in the fourth inning with his thirty-first homer. Both Yankee scores came on Charley Keller's pinch home run in the ninth.

Michigan State Defeats Wayne, 16-0

East Lansing, Mich., Sept. 30 (AP)—Michigan State College, fought to a standstill for three periods today by Wayne University, of Detroit, scored two touchdowns and a safety in the final eight minutes to turn back the invaders, 16-to-0.

It was the first game of the season for both terms. A crowd of 23,000 turned out to se the the contest, regarded by Michigan State fans as a tune-up for next week's Michigan State-Michigan game.

Cubs Divide Couple, Miss Third Place

Chicago, Sept. 30 (AP).—With not more than a few hours remaining of the season, the Cubs still haven't settled on their final position for 1939. Today they dropped into fourth place when they lost the first game of a doubleheader with the St. Louis Cardinals, 7 to 5, and then won the second, 5 to 1.

The Dodgers regaied the coveted spot by whipping the Phillies twice.

The Cubs collapsed in the first game when Larry French was removed for a pinch-hitter in the seventh. French's successors couldn't stop the Cardinals and in all the enemy made 13 hits off French, Earl Whitehill and Jack Russell.

Bill Lee supplied the impetus for the second game triumph when he limited the Cardinals to four hits to win his nineteenth victory of the season. The Cub

Record Field Enters Post Trophy Tourney

Chevy Chase Scene of Play On Tuesday

Play in Threesomes Slated; Champion Tees Off 1st; Low Net Will Anex Trophy

An entry that ties the all-time mark for District Women's Golf Association's Tournaments—193—will compete in the seventh annual Washington Post Tournament Tuesday at Chevy Chase, according to pairings released yesterday by Mrs. Hugh Rowan and Mrs. Frank H. Kramer.

MS. McNITT

The record-tying field will play in threesomes, excepting three instances, and will start both from the first and tenth tees. District champion, Mrs. Leo Walper, and a Capital Clubmate, Mrs. Edward Fox, will lead the field at 7:55, while Mrs. A. A. Morrill and Mrs. C. D. Snow, of Kenwood, will be last off the tee at 11:35.

Mrs. Arnold McNitt, Congressional, winner of the last Post Match Play Tournament last year at Manor, will play at 9 o'clock with Mrs. V. P. Simmons and Mrs. O. G. Eible, Congressional. This is the first year at medal play, as the tourney was a six-day match play event previous to this year's event. It was changed at the wishes of the Women's golf body.

The lo wnet scorer of the 18-hole event will receive the Washington Post trophy that will go to the winner's club for a year, or as long as she is champion, plus an award for permanent possession. The low gross scorer will receive a suitable award in silver, and other winners will receive prizes from the Association, selected by Mrs. John Lever, chairman of the commitee.

The field includes each of the club champions crowned two weeks ago, including Mrs. E. C. Lutpon, Mrs. Myron Davy, Mrs. Betty Meckley, Mrs. David Clark, Mrs. Henry Goodman, Mrs. L. G. Pray, Mrs. J. F. Gross and Sally Whipple, in addition to Mrs. Bishop Hill, champion of the host club, who begins a title defense tomorrow.

Mrs. Meckley won the gross prize last year, and with Marion Brown, a former champion over the match play route, will be co-favored.

Timely Block Aids Indians to Score

Although he looks quite harmless lying on the ground, Ben Simpson (No. 27), William and Mary, made possible his team's only touchdown against Navy yesterday by preventing Emmitt Wood from tackling ballcarrier Hal Birchfield, who ran 54 yards. The play happened in the second quarter and tied the score at 6-6. Navy opened up later to win, 31-6

N.Y.U.'s 65-Yd. Drive Defeats Colgate, 7-6

Violets Rally After Loser's Bill Geyer Races 88 Yds. to Score

By the Associated Press

Hamilton, N. Y., Sept. 30.—New York University's violet-clad football team put on a 65-yard touchdown drive late in the fourth quarter, capped that off with a successful placekick, and thereby opened its season with a 7-6 decision over Colgate today in the first game to be played in Colgate's new stadium.

The Violets bloomed just in time, for Colgate had started that final period by sending Substitute Halfback Bill Geyer freewheeling over N. Y. U.'s left tackle for 88 yards.

Boell Star of Game

At the moment, it seemed relatively unimportant when the pass from center, on the extra-point try, bobbled along the ground. Neither team had been able to stage anything like a consistent attack.

But N. Y. U. sent big Ed Boell back into the game, and it was the senior passing star who accounted personally for all of the Violets' yardage along its winning march.

He started by passing to Joe Lamanna for 25 yards, then tossed a short one for three more to Bill Galu. That brought the ball to the Colgate 37. Boell made another first down through the line, spun over the Colgate middle for 20 yards to the Red Raider 8 and then, three plays later, cut back sharply over a hole at tackle for the touchdown.

Ties It Up

That tied the score at 6-all, and Galu, in the game for Stan Mikulka, kicked a perfect placement with the slippery, soggy ball to give the game to New York. Boell, to round out a big day, held the ball.

This was, at least for the next few years, the last game in the N. Y. U.-Colgate series. N. Y. U. is the leader in the standing with five victories to Colgate's three. Two games ended in ties.

Little Series Postponed Again

Rochester, N. Y., Sept. 30 (AP).—Rain forced postponement of the delayed third little world series game scheduled for today and the series commission decided the next three games would be played in Louisville, Ky., starting tomorrow afternoon.

The series between the Colonels of the American Association and the Rochester Red Wings of the International League has been dogged by adverse weather since the first game Tuesday night, which Louisville won, 7 to 0. Rochester dropped the only other contest of the series Thursday night, 3 to 1.

The teams will meet again Monday and Tuesday nights, the commission decreed, and if necessary will return to Rochester to decide the four-out-of-seven-game series. A heavy rain last night previously forced postponement of the third game until today.

Roanoke, Concord Game Postponed

Salem, Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—Roanoke's game with Concord, scheduled here tonight, was postponed until Monday, October 2, because of a heavy rain which covered the field with water, Gordon C. (Pop) White, Maroon coach, announced an hour before game time.

The game will be played on College Field at 8 o'clock Monday.

feeling out they had a tough proposition.

This combination remained in play throughout the first half, and its attack functioned with success only in brief stages. The Indians actually outplayed their adversaries in the first two periods as indicated by the fact that they rolled up 5 first downs for a net gain of 110 yards, compared to Navy's 4 for 98 yards, but the fortunes of battle changed in lightning-like fashion in the latter stages.

The Tars tore through the visitors' line and around their flanks almost at will. Final statistics showed Navy with 18 first downs as compared with 7 for the Indians and the corresponding yardage was much greater in favor of the Middies. Navy completed 5 out of 16 forward passes for a net gain of 84 yards, while the Indians were successful in 4 out of 21 tries for 101 yards. Each team had two of its aerials intercepted. The work of the rival kickers was on a par, the average of each being 35.

Even in First Half

The teams battled on practically even terms during the greater part of the first period. Four minutes before first ended the Tars drew first blood, when Rowse, substitute back, pushed through William and Mary's right tackle for 17 yards and a touchdown. Prior to this each team made a scoring threat, in spite of a decided tendency to juggle the ball, but neither was able to develop the final punch.

The Indians took slight command of the situation at the beginning of the second quarter and about midway of the session accounted for the most spectacular play of the game to score their lone touchdown. The visitors had the ball on their own 46-yard line following an exchange of punts. Birchfield, from kick formation, ran around Navy's right flank behind splendid interference, and sprinted 54 yards for a touchdown. The same player failed in the try for point, as did Wood, of Navy, so the half ended in a deadlock at 6-all.

The Tars entered the second half with grim determination. Practically an entire second-string combination was then on the field and it remained for these understudies to tear the opposing line to bits.

Malcolm, Gebert Star

Everett Leonard, Bob Leonard, Wesley Gebert and Charlie Beers were the big works in the belated offensive. Each slashed off gains ranging from two to more than 20 yards. Gebert and Malcolm were the aces. Gebert registered Navy's second touchdown toward the close of the third period following a drive of 40 yards. But it was in the final session that the Navy lads had things all their own way. Three touchdowns came in quick succession. At the same time, the Virginians were powerless to make headway.

Pittman Beats Dettweiler at Congressional

McAleer, Billy Shea Holland Also Gain Golf Semifinals

Gene Pittman defeated Medalist Billy Dettweiler in the second round of the Congressional Club championship yesterday, 2 and 1, taking the first three holes of the back nine for the winning punch. They turned even and, after Pittman won three in a row, Dettweiler cut the margin to 1 at the fifteenth but lost to a birdie on 16 and halved 17 for the match.

The other semifinalists won by bigger margins. Earl McAleer turned on the heat on the second nine to win, 5 and 4, over Larry Bernard, while Billy Shea won over P. J. Winkler, 4 and 2, and R. J. Holland scored over George Neville, 5 and 4.

Iowa U. Crushes South Dakota, 41-0

Iowa City, Ia., Sept. 30 (AP).—Iowa warmed up for the Big Ten campaign here today by crushing South Dakota U., 41 to 0, in a nonconference opener before 15,000 fans.

The Hawks counted once in the first period and thrice in the second before Coach Eddie Anderson turned the contest over to his reserves. Niles Kinnick dashed through the Coyotes for three touchdowns and pitched two other passes for scores.

Merkle Beats Miller, Wins Columbia Title

Two-Time Winner of Union Printers' Golf Championship, Celebrates Ninth Year as Golfer While Winning Crown

Edgar A. Merkle completed a week's play in the underdog role in the Columbia Club championship by winning the title over George F. Miller yesterday, 2 and 1. The two-time winner of the Union Printer's championship was celebrating his ninth year as a golfer, almost to the day, having taken up the game in September, 1930.

The new and surprise champion, who succeeded Tommy Webb, jr., won the first hole against Miller and was never worse than even, a contrast to his other matches where he trailed by two holes at the fourteenth on two occasions, and in the second round was five down at the ninth.

Miller, who gained the finals by an upset triumph over the favorite, Martin McCarthy, was a 2 and 3 to 1 favorite over Merkle but the latter's backers paid off when Merkle won the sixteenth and seventeenth holes with pars, for the match.

Merkle was two up at the fifth hole, and held a one-hole margin at the turn as six ot fhe nine holes were halved. The new champion was in trouble on the eleventh and the match was even, but he went one up again on the twelfth. A pushed tee shot got him in trouble again on fourteen, and once more Miller squared the match.

They halved the fourteenth, and Miller's approaches failed him on the next two holes as Merkle won the short sixteenth with a par and the seventeenth when he failed to get on in two but pitched three feet away and dropped the putt.

The annual championship dinner followed the play, with medalists, winners, runner-up and consolation winners in each of the eleven flights awarded prizes. Page Cornwell won the championship flight consolation and C. H. Severance the second sixteen.

PGA President To Give McLeod Life-Time Pass

Jacobus to Present Membership Card At Dinner Here Friday

George R. Jacobus, five-time president of the National P. G. A., has accepted an invitation from Bob Barnett to present Fred McLeod with a lifetime membership to the Middle Atlantic P. G. A. at the dinner here Friday night, following the annual championship.

JACOBUS

Jacobus will fly here from his course in New Jersey on Friday for the presentation, and is one of several notables that will be on hand for the testimonial dinner to P. G. A. Senior's Champion McLeod.

The Middle Atlantic P. G. A. Open, which will be preceded by a pro-amateur on Wednesday, with the championship proper Thursday and Friday, 36-holes each day, is fast taking shape as one of the greatest tourneys in the city's history.

National P. G. A. Champion Henry Picard and Open Titleholder Byron Nelson will play in an exhibition Thursday afternoon, about 2:15 p. m., with McLeod and the leader of the morning round. The match will follow the field.

Barnett and Al Houghton, who are working on the event, warn the pros and the amateur entries that entries will close tomorrow night at 6 p. m. with Barnett in the Chevy Chase golf shop, and a check for the entry fee must accompany the entry. Post entries will positively not be accepted, under any circumstances.

First prize money will be $400, with 14 other prizes for the next pro finishers. The amateur prize list has been increased over the past week, and the starting field will find at least 35 simonpures entered.

Barnett is also anxious to close the list for the dinner honoring McLeod on Friday, and is taking reservations at Chevy Chase.

The match on Thursday will be open to the public, as will be the tourney all the way through. Programs will be on sale, to boost the prize money. M. W. W.

Georgia Starts Butts Regime With 26-0 Win

The Citadel Plowed Under Despite Bulldogs' Lack of Polish, 170 Yards Lost Through Pealties

By the Associated Press

Athens, Ga., Sept. 30.—Long on power but short on polish, Georgia launched a new football regime today by trimming a mediocre team from The Citadel, 26-0.

Making their debut under new Head Coach Wallace Butts, the Bulldogs cheered their backers by mauling the undermanned light brigade for great hunks of yardage. But they countered these hopeful signs by inept play that brought the amazing total of 170 yards in penalties.

The Red and Black regiment rolled to 350 yards through rushing and passed for 140 but tossed away several scoring chances. Although the invaders' offense was not impressive, the Georgian ground defenses looked sound in holding the Brigadiers to a net of 7 yards. But here again there was a darker side because the visitors clocked on 5 of 12 passes, even though the tosser was given little protection.

Mims Pushed Over

Checked by a pass interception on a drive after the first kickoff, the Bulldogs drove 70 yards on eight plays for their first score, Billy Mims taking it the last two. Dashes of 28 and 17 yards by Oliver Hunnicutt and a 20-yard Mims-to-Malone pass being the big factors. Knox Elderedge kicked the point.

The second quarter scoring drive also started from the Georgia 30 and carried over in nine plays, Substitute Henry Powers going the final five and Guest adding the point. Powers' 28-yard tackle-slice and a 17-yard pass to Skipworth were high spots here.

Hughes Intercepts

Steve Hughes, towering substitute center, served up the major thrill when he checked the Citadel's sole scoring threat by snatching Graham Edwards' flat pass on the Bulldog 11 and legging 85 yards to the goal.

Cliff Kimsey took charge of the final score, taking over on the Georgia 25 and charging 27 yards. Hunnicutt added 8 and Kimsey bulled 38 through right tackle, dragging three tacklers the last 3 yards to the Citadel 2. From there Nelson plugged it through.

A crowd of some 15,000, including thousands of high-school guests of the university, set an opening-day attendance mark.

Ribbons Widely Scattered in Opening of Columbia Show

Hunter Class Dominatedby Demopolis

Mr. and Mrs. Perry's 4-Year-Old Annexes Open Hunter Event; Show Ends Today

No stable in particular was able to walk away with honors in the opening session of the Columbus Horse Show at the Meadowbrook Saddle Club yesterday, as ribbons in both hunter and jumper classes were scattered among a varied group of exhibitors.

Demopolis, Mr. and Mrs. W. Haggin Perry's 4-year-old from Cobham, Va., appeared to be one of the likeliest prospects in the hunter division. He won the open hunters event and placed second in the hunter hacks, each time with Mrs. Perry up.

Thrills of Day

However, the real thrills of the day, from the spectators' point of view, came in the pony and junior classes, when Springsbury Farm's highly touted Victorian II, 46 inches of jumping ability, lived up to advance notices by making almost a clean sweep of the bantamweight division.

With 9-year-old Jack Lee Payne in the saddle, little Victorian jumped 4-foot fences, hacked like a mannerly mount for a child, and won or placed second in every class in which he was entered. Victorian, also a 9-year-old, had the grandstands in an uproar when he defeated a sizable class of horses in the working hunters event, placing over Frances Miller on Dan's Rocksand, Happy Christmas on Randle's Shadow, and Christian Wells on Headrock.

In the open jumping division, Howard Butz' Hobo, which at 22 is making his final ring appearance at this show, won the open jumpers class after three jump-offs with Capt. Kenneth Hoge's Broomfield. Hobo, ridden by Malvern Bell, also placed second to Fred Hughes, jr.'s, Black Caddy in the touch-and-out class to be the most consistent winner in his division.

The ladies hunters' class, one of the largest of the day, was won by Margaret Cotter on George G. Lee's good hunter-jumper, Lee's Birthday. Second went to a Pennsylvania importation, John Beach's Gaby Boy, ridden by Alice Walton, and third was taken by Springsbury's Brown Bruin, with Billie Wetherall up.

Miss Cotter also rode her own horse, Rocksie, to victory in the event for local working hunters, after a brilliant round over the outside course.

Show Continues Today

The show contitnues today with the battle for both hunter and jumper crowns wide open. Flag-raising ceremonies will be held at 12:45, with District Commissioner Melvin Hazen and Maryland State Senator Lansdale Sasscer participating.

On the card, commencing at 1, are model hunters, working hunters; Olympic class, bridle path hacks, $200 jumper stake with 17 entries, triple bar, $200 hunter stake, 5-foot class with 10 entries expected to run the fences into h 6-foot realm; Rosensteel challenge trophy hunt teams, and hunter jumper championships.

LEAD LINE CLASS—Won by Tommy Wowell; second, Betty Barron Smith; third, Virginia Devereaux; fourth, Tommy Owen.

Mississippi State Beats Arkansas, 19-0

Memphis, Tenn., Sept. 30 (AP).—A well-drilled Mississippi State eleven defeated Arkansas on a mud-soaked geld today, 19-0, before about 7,000 persons. The Mississippians bottled up Arkansas' vaunted aerial attack throughout and scored once on an intercepted pass.

Hunt Club Winds Up Show Plans

Two-Day Event at Farmington Starts Next Saturday

Charlottesville, Va., Sept. 30.—With the completion of the new ring courses for the Modified Olympic classes, the building of more box stalls, and the addition of several new boxes for spectators all is in readiness for the seventh annual Farmington Hunt Club Horse Show, to be held next Friday and Saturday, October 6 and 7.

The horse show committee, headed by Llewellyn Miller, was kept busy today recording the large list of entries, which closed yesterday. Indications are that most of the classes will be well filled and that competition will be keen for the numerous trophies and purses offered.

The two-day exhibition is expected to attract sportsmen from a wide area, and plans are under way for the entertainment of judges and exhibitors. There will be luncheons refreshments, and dances at the new Framington Country Club.

Session Starts at Nine

This year's program includes 32 classes and will start each morning at 9 o'clock. The afternoon sessions will begin at 2 o'clock, after a luncheon recess.

With the exception of the Middleburg Hunter Show, the Farmington exhibition is unique in being a late fall show in Virginia. Horses which have been on the long summer circuit, starting in May or early in June, and showing throught the famous Warrenton, Culpeper and Orange shows, have had a chance to get their second wind and hunters which have been turned out all summer at grass are now up and getting in good trim.

As a matter of course, hunter classes will predominate during the two-day exhibition. There will be events for green hunters, three-year-old hunters, hunter hacks, local hunters, ladies' hunters, thoroughbred hunters model hunters, qualified hunters, Corinthian class, pair hunters, half-bred hunters, hunt teams, working hunters, and parent and child.

Performance To Count

There will be six jumping classes all of which will be scored in accordance with A. H. S. A. rule 5, performance only to count. In case of ties, jumps may be raised. The events include novice jumpers, jumper sweepstake, touch and out, knock down and out, and Modified Olympic first and second day.

The program also provides for two pony classes—ponies under saddle and ponies over fences; A. S. P. C. A. horsemanship event; children's saddle class; novelty class (for any group of people in vehicles, or persons on horseback); seven breeding classes; and two championship classes, for best hunter and best jumper of the show.

Harvey Ladew, M. F. H., of Baltimore, has recently accepted an invitation to assist the judging. Other judges will be Mrs. Marion du Pont Scott, of Montpelier Orange county, and John Bowditch, of Wilmington, Del.

Gus Sonnenberg Wrestles E. Dusek Here Thursday

Gus Sonnenberg, former world's champion wrestling champion, who came along during the boom days of the mat game a decade or so back, snaps back into action on the local front Thursday night when he tackles Ernie Dusek, the Nebraskan, in the feature bout at Turner's Arena.

It was Sonnenberg who put the "Oomph" into the game with his famous flying tackle, and used to thrill the multitude with his daring tactics.

Familiarly known as "Dynamite Gus," Sonnenberg will be making his first appearance here in several seasons, and Promoter Turner has assigned the toughest performer in the business to oppose him. It will be a 90-minute limit brawl.

Woodward Explains His Star Has Not 'Been Right' Since Running of Dwyer

ers, Kentucky Derby, Dwyer and Belmont stakes.

Just before the running of the race, a distance test of one mile and five-eighth, a fog settled over the course and it was difficult to see the four starters clearly on the backstretch.

Get Off, Samuel D. Riddle's colt, was quickest to begin, but Chip In soon took the lead away from him and going around the first turn had a daylight advantage. Get Off went to the front again, however, with Chip in second, Hash third, and Shining One sticking close by him. Until the far turn the order was the same and then Hash moved up.

Coming into the stretch he was neck-and-neck with the Parker Corning colt and there his class told and he outgamed Chip In.

Hash earned $17,750.

Andy K., Millsdale Stable's good 2-year-old, led from start to finish to easily win the six and one-half furlong stakes and pay 7 to 5.

Calory was second and Strawberry was third, but they were never close to the flying Andy K., a colt that might be top notch if he can be trained to run straight.

He was on top before the bulky field of eleven had gone a furlong and in the stretch was just galloping along about six lengths in front of J. H. Whitney's Calory, which was second most of the way and a length ahead of Strawberry, one of the long shots of the party.

Andy K. won $5,875 by his victory and is eligible for Belmont's rich futurity next Saturday. He always has liked muddy going and the track was decidedly off from overnight rains.

My Sin Victor In 12-Liter Championship

New York, Sept. 30.—By winning three straight heats in the Gold Cup races at Detroit on Labor Day, Zalmon G. Simmons of Greenwich, Conn., took the 12-liter world championship, the racing commission of the American Power Boat Association announced today.

Simmons piloted his boat, My Sin, in the Detroit races. His victory gave him a total of 2,000 points in the international competition, which is based on an international series of races for the Gold Cup races.

Simmons entered the President's Cup Regatta in Washington, but his boat was forced out of the race in the first heat with a broken propeller.

The world championship was conceived by Count Theo Rossi of Italy and is sanctioned by the International Motor Yachting Union. The competition consists of four specified races annually—one each in Italy and France, and the Gold Cup and President's Cup events in this country.

The French race was cancelled this year; Count Rossi won the Italian event, in which no American boats participated. Harold Wilson of Ontario, Canada, driving Miss Canada III, won two heats and finished second in the third in the President's Cup event, His total of 1,900 points earned him second place in the international contest.

Two-dollar mutuels paid—PLAYMORE, $5.40, $3.30, $2.60; WOODWAAC, $3.30, $2.80; IVONIA, $3.00.

PLAYMORE, in close quarters going into clubhouse turn, was taken wide for racing room while improving position along backstretch, went to leaders with good energy and wore down WOODWAAC to hold on to end. WOODWAAC went up boldly to dispose of IVONIA and take command approaching stretch and fought it out willingly in closing test. IVONIA was steadied to backstretch, went to front when MORE POISE stopped, but weakened gradually thereafter. VICTORY LIGHT was in trouble early and went well thereafter.

SECOND RACE—One and one-eighth miles. Purse, $1,000; claiming. For 3-year-olds and upward. Start good from stalls. Won driving; place same. Went to post 2:51. Off 2:56. Winner, W. Elliott's ch. g. Two-dollar mutuels paid—COUNT TETRARCH, $3.80, $3.00, $2.40; SIR TIME, $4.60, $3.10; JACK PATCHES, $2.50.

COUNT TETRARCH, much the best, was steadied along on outside to backstretch, was not hurried while closest to JACK PATCHES' pace at far turn, came to front when asked to open long lead and held SIR TIME safe under drive. The latter responded willingly in stretch to move up menacingly, but hung in final 20 yards. JACK PATCHES went to front at once, but weakened badly after being displaced. MAEWHISK went evenly.

Daily Double, PLAYMORE and COUNT TETRARCH, Paid $6.70.

Two-dollar mutuels paid—EQUIPOX, $20.00, $9.30, $4.80; DEWY DAWN, $5.70, $3.40; CHALLAMORE, $2.60.

EQUIPOX, lacking early speed, came wide for racing room to move to leaders entering stretch and took command with bold rush to draw out under hand riding. DEWY DAWN, slow to begin, improved position to midstretch, but hung thereafter under intermittent punishment. CHALLAMORE was rushed to front in openins furlong, but weakened in final sixteenth. CHALLENCA had keen speed while racing wide and weakened at end. SMART SIR lost rider while trailing far back.

FOURTH RACE—One mile and 70 yards. Purse, $1,500. The Chestertown. Grade C. For 3-year-olds and upward. Start good from stalls. Won driving; place same. Went to post 4:02. Off at once. Winner, R. G. 32,000 Expected to See Redskins Battle Giants Here Today

New Yorkers Are Favored At Stadium

Passing Duel Between Baugh and Danowski Main Attraction in Rivals' First Meeting

Redskins vs. Giants, professional football's surefire attraction, which has set attendance records in both Washington and New York, moves onto the turf of Griffith Stadium again today with the Giants pronounced favorites.

Unbeaten in their last 14 games, the Giants will present the same array which toppled the Redskins, 36-0, last season and won the league championship. With Coach Steve Owens able to unleash such potent performers as Tuffy Leemans, Ed Danowski, Ward Cuff, Ken Strong and Mel Hein at an untested Redskin team, prevailing odds range from 2 to 1 to 5 to 2 in favor of the Giants.

The Giants, who occasioned Griffith Stadium's greatest crush of fans when they played to a crowd of 33,000 last season in the Redskins' home opener, will approach that record today. Indications that a crowd numbering 32,000 would be in the park today are positive. Only a few thousand seats were unsold late last night, and Redskin officials are prepared to disburse standing room tickets starting at noon today.

Passing Duel in Prospect

The crowd will be lured by the twin prospects of an upset victory by the Redskins and a forward-passing duel between Washington's Sammy Baugh and New York's Ed Danowski, hot rivals for the league's football pitching championship. It was a pass by Danowski in the last three minutes last season which fetched the Giants a 10-7 victory over the Redskins.

Heavy over the Redskins hangs the threat of a New York field goal, or a series of them. The Giants, under Owens, have placed great emphasis on the three points to be acquired by a placekick and any time they are in Redskin territory they will be dangerous. Already possessing one of the finest placekickers in the league in Ward Cuff, Owens this year also is able to present the potent toe of Ken Strong.

Anything the Redskins achieve or hope to achieve this afternoon is expected to evolve from Sammy Baugh, who is still regarded as the league's most dangerous passing threat. Baugh, in his finest physical condition since 1937, beat the Eagles with a touchdown pass two weeks ago, and gave evidence also that he will be a running back this season.

Baugh to Lug Ball

With Coach Ray Flaherty unable as yet to develop a single breakaway runner, Baugh is expected to do a generous share of the ball carrying. He is a slippery if not potent runner and the Redskins will be attempting to open up the Giants' defense for running plays.

Baugh will not be in the starting lineup. Coach Flaherty is hewing to his intention to start his shock troops and in the Redskins' backfield will be two rookies, Minnesota's Wilbur Moore and the University of Washington's Jimmy Johnston. Directing the Redskins' passing attack and likely to bear the brunt of the running game at the outset will be the capable Frank Filchock, who on occasion has stolen Baugh's thunder. Ernie Pinckert will be the fourth member of the starting backfield.

Moore, in his first pro league test two weeks ago, justified his presence in the backfield by ripping off steady, if not spectacular gains and proving a potent figure on the defense. Johnston, a tall 190-pounder, will be the speed boy of the starting backfield.

By the start of the second quarter the Redskins' No. 1 backfield of Baugh, Andy Farkas, Ed Justice and Jay Turner will move into action.

No mean factor in the pronounced favoritism of the Giants is the hefty but fast-moving New York line which averages 220 pounds and contains such performers as Hein, Del Isola, Orville Tuttle, Ed Widseth and Ox Parry, hard-bitten gents who yielded less ground than any other line in the league last season.

The Redskins tapered off their practice with a morning workout at Griffith Stadium yesterday. The Giants unlimbered for an hour in the afternoon.

Loudoun Dog Trials Slated October 2-4

Leesburg, Va., Sept. 30 (AP).—The sixth annual field trials of the Loudoun Gun Dog Club will be held October 2-4 at the J. D. Thomas farm near Round Hill.

Among out-of-State dog fanciers who have made entries is Dr. T. W. Shore, of Booneville, N. C., widely known pointer breeder.

Three stakes will be run, the open derby, all-age and members' shooting stake.

This Morning

With Shirley Povich

Well, now the Reds are in for it. And it's difficult to extend even a polite sympathy to the Cincinnati Club in its current predicament. They have only themselves to blame. They persisted in winning the National League pennant when everybody knew that it would lead only to a World Series against the Yankees. The Reds struggled to attain the very objective which every sensible National League club should seek to avoid.

POVICH

This department, as you may have guessed, is an incorrigible American Leaguer. We don't think the Reds would have finished in the first division of the American League. We're not attempting to be flippant. We mean it. But we are trying to be fair about this 1939 World Series business and give the Reds their due. In that frame of mind we sought a fresh viewpoint.

An old-time dealer in fresh viewpoints is Mr. John Riseling, city editor of The Post, and we put the question to him. "Mr. Riseling, you are a very circumspect fellow given to weighing matters honestly," we sugared him, "what is your feeling in the matter of the 1939 World Series between the Reds and the Yankees?"

No Short Cut to Victory

"Scram, I'm busy," cooed City Editor Riseling, and they heard him down at the other end of the block. "I'll see you later." He was as good as his word. He did see us later, and he had an answer.

"I have mulled this matter for a considerable length of time," said Riseling. "I have been figuring this World Series from every angle, but for the life of me I cannot see how the Yankees can win it in less than four games."

Our own aversion to the National League and National League pennant winners, particularly when they are playing the Yankees, is deep-rooted. What had once been an under-dog sympathy for National League clubs has given way to sheer disgust. National League idols have been exposed as rank flops when pitted against the American League's best. Big, strong, husky guys from the National League have actually performed shamefully in too many World Series.

There was 1927 when the Pirates scored only 10 runs in four games and were slapped down in four straight by the Yankees; 1928 when the Cardinals got the same dose; 1929, when Hack Wilson was the only man on the Cubs to stand up and take his usual cut at the fast ball of Lefty Grove, the series going only five games; 1932 when the Yanks mopped up the Cubs in four straight; 1937 when the Giants won only one game from the Yanks, and last year when the Yanks slapped down the Cubs again in four straight.

Reds Barely Staggered Home

In between, the National League won a couple of World Series, but never when they were playing the Yankees. And the count of the seven All-Star games stands: American League, five; National, two. Somehow, National League ball players simply don't measure up. It's significant that the National is filled with American League cast-offs and that Bill Werber, a discarded American League third baseman, blossomed as a star with the pennant-winning Reds, whose best pitcher, incidentally, is Bucky Walters, a no-account third baseman when he was in the American League.

Occasionally, the National League comes up with a ball player who would be a stand-out also in the American League. Ducky Medwick would star in any league, and so would the Dean brothers when they had it, and Gabby Hartnett and Mel Ott and the Waners. But such as Leo Durocher, the National's all-league shortstop, wouldn't command the waiver price from an American League club.

It's significant that the Reds just did stagger home ahead of the St. Louis Cardinals, who weren't even rated as a good ball club when American Leaguers saw 'em in the South this spring. In barely beating out the Cardinals, the Reds finished ahead of a team that had only one capable outfielder, an infield that was a joke, and a pitching staff that would evoke a belly-laugh from any self-respecting manager of a first-division American League club.

When they finally clinched the pennant after being shut out for 24 consecutive innings, the Reds won it in a screwy sort of way. Paul Derringer allowed the Cardinals 14 hits and only three runs while the Reds were winning the game on eight hits. Picture, yourself, how many runs the Yankees would have scored on 14 hits.

The Yankees have a way of showing up these National League heroes. In Chicago last year the citizens all but deified big Bill Lee, the pitcher who had literally pitched the Cubs to the pennant. He would stop the Yankees. He did all right for a bit in the opening game and then along came Frankie Crosetti with a home run over the left field wall and Joe Di Maggio with a home run over the left field wall and it was curtains for the Cubs.

With the Yankees in charge again, the country can rest easily for a few days. This week, at least, there will be no Red Menace.

Gophers Rout Arizona Eleven In Opener, 60-0

40,000 Fans Watch Winners Score Five Times in 1st Period

By the Associated Press

Minneapolis, Sept. 30.—Minnesota routed Arizona in the Big Ten champions' opening game today, winning 62 to 0 before some 40,000 persons.

The Wildcats from the Far Western border conference were hopelessly outclassed, Minnesota getting 34 points in the first period.

Coach Bernie Bierman used almost five elevens, testing out his squad for the strenuous schedule ahead. He found needed front line power in Bob Smith, guard, and John Billman and Butch Levy, tackles, all sophomores.

Game Becomes Track Meet

His backfield steamed behind the hard-charging line which opened the gates for Harold Van Every and George Franck, veteran halfbacks, and Sophomores Bruce Smith, Joe Mernik and Bob Sweiger, the latter a fullback with the potentialities of a Joesting or a Nagurski, Minnesota immortals.

The game became a field meet from the third play when Van Every knifed through tackle, slanted to his left and ran 66 yards for the first score. He ran and passed spectacularly during his short stay in the game, setting up one touchdown with an accurate heave and pitching over the last line for another.

Bruce Smith Stars

Bruce Smith, heralded sophomore halfback, lived up to his advance notice, scoring twice, running elusively in end sweeps and passing in one touchdown drive.

Capt. Win Pedersen at tackle mustered tremendous strength against the Arizona forwards and gave his backs plenty of incentive to hustle.

Manhattan Bows, 28 to 0

By the United Press.

Worcester, Mass., Sept. 30.—Another Osmanski galloped for Holy Cross today and the Crusaders opened their 1939 football campaign with a 28-0 victory over Manhattan.

Last year it was "Bullet Bill" Osmanski, hard-driving fullback, who led Holy Cross to victory in every game but that against Carnegie Tech.

"Bullet Bill" is gone but his brother Joe played his first varsity game today and scored two touchdowns.

Joe today shared scoring honors with Henry Giardi who countered the other Holy Cross touchdowns.

Start Substitutes

Holy Cross started its substitutes and was held scoreless in the opening period. Then in the second, Giardi and Osmanski each scored once. Giardi went 39 yards in three plays for a score while Osmanski caught a 14-yard pass from Ronnie Cahill for his score.

In the last period, Holy Cross scored twice. Cahill whipped a 23-yard pass to Giardi for one touchdown and, after recovering a fumble on the Manhattan 17-yard stripe, Osmanski ran 13 yards to a touchdown. Jim Turner kicked all the extra points from placement.

Illinois, Bradley In Scoreless Tie

Champaign, Ill., Sept. 30 (AP).—Illinois, suffering from another case of opening day jitters, was held to a scoreless tie today by a scrapping team from Bradley Tech, of Peoria. The Illini completely outrushed Bradley but failed to capitalize on at least a half dozen drives into the opposition territory.

New River State Beats Shepherd, 6-0

Shepherdstown, W. Va., Sept. 30.—New River State Teachers College defeated the Shepherd State Teachers eleven in the rain this afternoon 6-to-0. The lone score was by Braddock, in the first quarter, who went from the eight-yard line over on the second of two line plunges after a 36-yard pass had put the visitors in striking position.

On the Line

With CONSIDINE

New York, Sept. 30.—Twenty years ago, in the city of Cincinnati, there began the blackest episode in the history of sport—the 1919 World Series. A handful of conscienceless or dumb ball players from the Chicago White Sox agreed to throw the series to the Reds for bribes ranging up to $10,000. The gambling coup was engineered by two prominent New York gamblers, one of whom has since succumbed to a bad case of perforation.

CONSIDINE

This week the Reds get back into the World Series for the first time since they were the innocent parties to that rape of the game's good name. It's cleaner air into which they step this time. Since the day it scraped bottom and nearly capsized, baseball has been the most honestly played game in existence, and the Reds face the little problem of playing the most honest team of them all—the Yanks. The Yanks wouldn't give a blind commuter the right time.

Looking Back on Last Red Pennant

But it is interesting, on the eve of what promises to be a fine series, to look back on that last appearance of the Reds. Not to the trial of the crooks who tossed mud on the game, nor even to that historically poignant kid who tugged at the coat of Joe Jackson, as the great slugger left the courtroom, convicted, and who cried "Say it ain't so, Joe!"

Instead, let's rummage through the old files and look at the progress of the series itself. A little more than 99 per cent of the baseball world had not the faintest shadow of suspicion as the mess unfolded itself, but when you read the accounts of the games today it is a shock to see the number of fingerprints the robbers left behind them.

Lost in a blizzard of pre-series predictions, just before John Philip Sousa led his band onto the field before the opening game at Redland, was a story concerning a strange drop in the odds. The White Sox were 7-to-10 favorites two days before the series. They took the field an even-money proposition. "The sudden appearance of thousands of dollars of Cincinnati money no doubt was occasioned by the rumored indisposition of Kid Gleason's star pitcher, Eddie Cicotte," the New York Times said. "Last night at John Doyle's a wealth of Cincinnati money suddenly floated forth," it continued. "Several $1,000 bets were registered. One of $5,000 to $7,000 on the Reds was also covered. Mr. Doyle estimates that at least $2,000,000 will be bet on the series."

9-1 Lacing Awakened Suspicions

The Reds won the first game, 9-1. "Never before in the history of America's biggest baseball spectacle has a pennant-winning club received such a disastrous drubbing in an opening game," the Times man started his story.

"The irrepressible Reds broke into a violent storm in the fourth inning and sent the crowd of 31,000 into a delirious spasm of popeyed enthusiasm by clubbing Eddie Cicotte out of the box." A fan named J. W. Pugh died of a heart attack during the rally, the paper also noted. The Woodland Bardu, a group of Owner Charley Comiskey's friends, lost $33,000 in bets on the game.

The Reds won the second, 4-2, Claude Williams being "seized with a startling attack of wildness in the fourth." Williams put every Red run on base with a walk. Joe Jackson made three hits, then struck out with two on base. Swede Risberg made a costly error. The stunned Gleason told reporters after the game, "I expect to start Dickey Kerr tomorrow but I might use Cicotte, as I have every confidence in Eddie." As it turned out he started Kerr, and little Dickey won 3-0, giving the suddenly cooled-off Reds three hits.

Eddie Got Another Chance—Failed

The opening lines of the Times' story of the fourth game bear reprinting. "Chubby Eddie Cicotte, veteran slabman of the White Sox, begged Manager Kid Gleason today to let him go in against the Reds. Eddie wanted to vindicate himself for his failure in the opener. He implored and beseeched for another chance . . . Gleason turned a sympathetic ear to Cicotte's supplication and Eddie went against the Reds in one last desperate effort to wipe out the blot of his most disastrous failure. Cicotte failed again. The confidence in his pitching arm was vindicated, but with two disastrous errors in the fifth Cicotte wiped out all the good of his flinging and with his own erratic hands paved the way for a 2-0 victory for the Reds."

Christy Matthewson wrote for a syndicate that he believed Cicotte's trouble was the change in the wind. "The suddenly cold breeze coming off Lake Michigan probably chilled his old soupbone. With the game in a scoreless deadlock in the fifth, Duncan hit to Cicotte. Eddie had to make a quick throw to first, and threw wild. Kopf then singled to left. Duncan was held at third, but, as he pulled up there, Cicotte tried to intercept the throw-in from the outfield and the ball rolled to the grandstand, permitting Duncan to cross the plate. This was enough to win the ball game."

Young Reporter Smelled a Rat

When Williams lost 5-0 the next day, blowing up in the sixth, a young reporter named Jack Lait dispatched a wire to his thunderstruck friend Kid Gleason, who wouldn't see him, and said that he thought the White Sox had turned black. The next day the White Sox blew a 4-run lead to lose 5-4, and Lait predicted that it would be only a matter of time before the mess would be dragged out in the open. He was regarded as an eccentric alarmist by the experts. Cicotte won the next game, 4-1, with Felsh and Jackson hitting the ball well. But with Hod Eller chucking up his shine ball, the Reds clinched the series the next day with a 10-5 victory. Williams losing his third listless game.

It was a year before Lait's prophecy came true, and when it did it created a shock which will outlive any of the sabateurs. We used to think that baseball had dealt too harshly with some of the Black Sox, notably Jackson, who hit .375 in the series. But a look at the old files, a memory of the faith the rapists abused, and the recollection that the honest game will never be able to eradicate their memory, makes me think now that anything sort of a firing squad constituted pampering.

Notre Dame Beats Purdue

gau without a gain at rightguard, threw Zontini for a 5-yard loss, and finally gave up 2 yards to Thesing on a plunge at center.

Here was Kelleher's spot. In he came, as Sitko used to do in his sophomore year and as the graduated Bill Hofer had time and time again last year. Kelleher looked over the defense, the angle of the kick and promptly called his own signal, with Zontini holding the ball. It was low, but dead center.

The defense of both teams appeared set for every trick of the opponents. Both teams use the Notre Dame system, and their precision shifts were so nearly alike they might have been coached by the same man.

Purdue's mightily touted attack, manned by the elusive three Bees—Mike Byelene, Jack Brown and Lou Brock—was broken by Brock's practice injury and the Boilermaker's couldn't find the range until a young sophomore from Chicago, Halfback Johnny Galvin, showed them how late in the fourth period.

Byelene heaved the next one to Dave Rankin, an end, and Rankin was downed on Notre Dame's 37-yard line. That's as close as they got all afternoon to the Irish goal.

Harpers Ferry Eleven Scores, 13-2

Martinsburg, W. Va., Sept. 30.—Harpers Ferry's High football Tigers, after a slow start, scored two touchdowns in the second half of a game here today to defeat Shepherdstown (W. Va.), High, 13-2. Shepherdstown's two points came on a safety in the opening period when Nichols Harpers Ferry back, fumbled behind his own goal.

Hurricane Scares Army

Frontczak dropped back to the 15 and place-kicked a field goal to give the Cadets a 10-to-0 edge.

Late in the same period Furman finally cashed in on its efforts. Jim Martin had signaled for a fair catch on the Furman 49. He was hit, and the penalty against the Army gave the Southerners the ball on the Army 36.

Roten Shepley Star

Big Roten Shepley, an outstanding star today, then started a running and passing attack when he dropped back from the 23 and whipped a long pass to Bob Frazer, who took it on the 8 and romped over the goal untouched. Shepley's placekick was good.

The third period saw a dogfight, with Army pushing to the Furman 5-yard line as the period ended. They got no farther as the fourth quarter started, and Furman finally took the ball on downs on its 13.

Late in the period, Army had taken the ball in midfield on downs. John Hatch started pitching and running. The drive apparently was halted on Furman's 4, but on fourth down Hatch shot a pass to Bill Mullin in a corner of the end zone. Mullin's placekick was wide.

It was difficult to pick out an Army star as the team functioned as a unit. The same was true of the Furman line, but Shepley, Jim Martin and C. V. Lipscomb were standouts in the backfield, all breaking away on occasion for fine gains.

The game saw 34 passes, 18 by Army. The Cadets completed 10, and Furman 8 of its 16. Soft footing and excessive humidity provided a twin handicap for both teams.

Dogs . . .

By George Berner

DOGS VS. CATS

We are continually being asked why we don't write anything about cats, and folks always bring up the fact that there are almost as many cats kept as pets as there are dogs. We wouldn't know about that and we don't know a lot about cats, but we think that Capt. Will Judy's bit on the cat and dog question is just about right.

BERNER

"We like cats. They furnish running exercise for dogs and always win the race. They are living, moving things of beauty, softness and grace. Like the dog, they are a heritage from the wilderness. But whereas Fido has made an almost complete adjustment between savagery and civilization, Pussy clings to most of the ways of her ancestors.

"She is still a member of her ancient race of panthers, lions and tigers. She is a tiger of small size who favors you with her presence in your house. Sleeping haughtily at your very fireplace, she permits you to occupy the house with her.

She moves with all the proudness of her proud race. One would think that such diminutive descendants of the lion and tiger would be marked with humility. But her very whiskers, pure relic of the jungle and its shadows, exude haughtiness. She washes herself publicly that all may see the rite of the elite.

She likes the darkness; the stars evoke the melody of her soul (on these noctural romantic occasions, more commonly "his" soul). She travels alone. Who has seen a pack of cats? Secrecy confided to no one is her abiding trait. Behind those greenish - yellow eyes, guarded by pupils now round, now upright, reside mystery, adventure and dark plannings.

"She possesses a most uncertain disposition. Her set countenance staring at your face shamelessly, may mean friendliness or a scratch. That gracefully agile tail may be but a salute to those about to die. She is a daughter of many moods, royal in her fits of temper.

Where the cat is a pet the dog is a companion. Where the cat is a lady, the dog is a roustabout. Where the cat is disdainful, the dog is a good fellow. Where the cat is unconcerned with its mistress, the dog imitates the moods of his master. We use "she" when speaking of cats, but refer to the dog as "he," and could there be more conclusive proof of what we are trying to argue than this natural choice of pronoun in the third person?"

Dog Mart Opens

The Fredericksburg Chamber of Commerce has announced that the dog mart, larger and better than ever, will be held on Friday, October 13.

The mart, revived four years ago and patterned after those held away back when these United States were in the infant stage, is unlike anything else in which dogs have a part. There are pure-bred dog shows everywhere, and mutt shows by the score, but the dog mart includes everything that even resembles a dog. The only qualification is that the animal must bark at one end and wag at the other.

There is no entry or admission fee. It's an all-day affair, the show in the morning and the dog auction in the afternoon. It's well worth seeing and only 50 miles away.

Washington Vet Honored

Dr. Mason Weadon recently returned from the annual convention of the American Veterinary Medical Society at Memphis. While there Dr. Weadon was selected to demonstrate the technique used in several very delicate eye operations.

QUERIES

Q. I heard a man say recently that a dog was short on "leather." What did he mean?

A. He was probably speaking of a hound and meant that the dog was short in the ears. "Leather" refers to ears in dogs.

Q. What is meant by the term "Lurcher" as applied to a dog?

A. Lurcher was the name given the dogs owned by poachers. They were usually a cross between a Greyhound and retriever, as their work, stealing game from private estates, required speed.

Q. Are Boston Terriers' ears trimmed or are they naturally small and erect?

A. The Boston's ears are naturally erect but most of them are cropped.

Q. Is it true that some dogs wash themselves? How many animals are there that wash themselves, besides the cat family?

A. To the best of our knowledge, no. We've always had to do it for our dogs anyway. The birds are the only things which wash themselves other than the cats.

Q. To settle an argument, will you state in your column if wild dogs bark or if they don't?

A. Wild dogs do not bark.

McKinley Loses To Episcopal Eleven, 12-7

Walsh Runs 80 Yards To Score; Green Stars With His Long Passes

Except for a quick thrust on a "sleeper" play with less than 3 minutes of the final quarter remaining, McKinley High was convincingly throttled yesterday as it opened its season with a 12-7 setback at the hands of Episcopal High on the winner's gridiron.

Charley Green, seeing action in his first high school game, did the hurling for Tech's lone tally from behind his own 20. Jack Walsh came out of hiding to take the ball on Episcopal's 45 and raced zig-zag down the field behind excellent blocking for the 80-yard touchdown. Green again took to the air for the extra point, this time Bob (Shipwreck) Kelley nabbing it over the line.

Boots Field Goal

Throughout the earlier part of the game, however, the play was all Episcopal's. Bill Goodwin, spark of the defenders' attack, provided Episcopal's initial lead midway of the first period when he dropped back to the 39 on fourth dawn and booted accurately through the uprights.

The only touchdown for the winners came in the second period as the result of a sustained drive from the Episcopal 39. Goodwin and little Jesse Couch starred in the big push, the former finally tripping off right tackle to score standing up from the 10-yard stripe. His toe failed him then, however, and the placement was wide.

Second Team a Threat

Tech's second team provided the losers' most serious threat, while Episcopal turned loose two elevens of about equal talent. Don Cockrille, regular passer for the Maroon, was unable to match the accuracy of young Green, three of his aerials being intercepted. Walsh and Kelley displayed brilliant receiving ability.

The game was featued by the long kicks of Episcopal's Red Bradfield, who time and again gained ground in punting exchanges with Cochrille and Green. Dick West, E. K. Poe and George Neff failed to pick up ground for Alexandrians on only a few occasions, their chief trouble being with Tech linemen, Benner, Souther, Priesser and Kemper.

Passing and Running Of Dick Main Factor In Lone Touchdown In Lexington Battle

Special Dispatch to The Post

Wilson Field, Lexington, Va., Sept. 30.—Washington and Lee chalked up a safety in the first period and smashed through for a touchdown in the second to defeat a stubborn Sewanee eleven, 0 to 0, here this afternoon in the opening game.

The Generals gained two points when Courtney Wadlington, end, and Kelly Litteral, tackle, drove Sewanee's J. B. Hagler back across his own goal when he attempted to run after fumbling a pass from center.

Dick and Bobby Pinck, brothers from Paterson, N. J., led the parade down field that gave Washington and Lee the lone touchdown of the game. Dick Pinck's accurate passing and running was a material factor in advancing the ball to Sewanee's six-yard stripe. Bobby smashed through the line for the score, nad brother Dick added the extra point on a line plunge.

The General's made 10 first downs to 7 for the visitors, and gained 143 yards rushing to Sewanee's 74. The Generals completed three of nine attempted forward passes, while Sewanee made good four out of six aerials.

Much of the game developed into a punting duel after a summer-like rain and thunder storm swept the field. Sewanee, with Hagler doing most of the punting, held a slight margin in kicking with an average of 35 yards to the Generals' 33. Pres Brown and Justice did the Generals' punting.

A crowd of approximately 1,500 saw the game. The crowd included groups of high school students who were guests of the University of Washington and Lee's "first annual high school day."

Cortland Beats West. Maryland In Hailstorm

Victors Pile Up 12 Points Before Storm Chases Suectators Home

By the Associated Press

Westminster, Md., Sept. 30.—A driving Cortland eleven defeated Western Maryland in a season opener here today, holding the Terrors scoreless and piling up 12 points themselves before old man weather took over the play in the final quarter. A rain and hail storm emptied the stands for the final period.

Ruppert recovered a Terror fumble on the latter's 37-yard line and Lockwood cracked 9 yards on the first Cortland play. Hathaway circled left end to the 13-yard stripe, McDonald plunged to the 6 and two plays later earned a first down on the 4-yard line. He plunged over on the next play. Along missed the try for the extra point.

Out-Maneuvered Consistently

Out-maneuvered consistently by Cortland, Western Maryland ended the first quarter without getting into Cortland territory and Cortland sent in its second team for the second period.

The Terrors slashed away with a series of first downs, and Cortland rushed its first string back into the fray. Western Maryland got its offensive in gear and reached midfield in what appeared to be a march until Cortland's White intercepted a Terror pass. Neither team gained on three punt exchanges. The second period ended without a scoring threat from either side.

The Terrors launched a drive after the midway rest, ball-toting by Knepp and Elder and a sizzling pass, Elder to Stropp, putting Western Maryland on the 8-yard stripe. They bogged down there, however, and Cortland, pulling a line play with their backs to the goal, shook the hip-shifting Hathaway into the clear. With Mundssaly streamlining his path, Hathaway ran 78 yards for the visitors' second score. Mundssaly's try for the extra goal was blocked. A threatening rainstorm sent many spectators from the stadium as the quarter ended.

Cortland stopped a Terror drive and Hathaway again broke loose for a long dash to the goal that was nullified by a penalty. A rain and hail storm broke midway in the period, and the remainder of the game was played at a deadlock before empty stands. The Terrors, on one of their infrequent trips across the 50-yard line, advanced to the enemy 30 when the gun barked.

Huntington Wins 1st Play-Off Game

Greenock, Md., Sept. 30.—Huntington nine took a 1-game lead on Greenock here today in the first clash of the Southern Maryland League playoffs, tripping the home team, 11-8.

Howard Norfolk, Huntington's successful hurler, held the hosts to 8 safeties while his mates were pounding Herbert Carter for 14. Lane hit two homers for the winners, driving in six of the winning runs.

The second of the series will occur today at Huntington.

Mt. St. Mary's Scores Early and Hangs On To Beat Potomac St.

Special Dispatch to The Post

Frederick, Md., Sept. 30.—Capitalizing upon two fumbles in the opening period, Mount St. Mary's scored a pair of touchdowns to defeat a stubborn Potomac State College eleven from Keyser, W. Va., in the opening fooball game for the Mountaineers at Emmitsburg today. The final score was 16-0.

Bobby Stevens tallied the first touchdown five minutes after the opening kickoff when DeBottis blocked and recovered Yost's punt on the Potomac State 16, and the fleet Mountaineer back went around left end for a score. Asip placekicked the extra point.

Foy's recovery of another visiting fumble on the 8-yard stripe near the end of the first period paved the way for a second Mount St. Mary's touchdown. Asip, on a reverse through left tackle, scored easily and then added the extra point.

Handicapped by a hard downpour, neither team was able to accomplish much until the fourth quarter, when Rogan blocked Yost's kick and recovered it outside the end zone for a safety.

Potomac State displayed little in the way of an offensive attack, making but two thrusts into Mountaineer territory. Yost got away for a 35-yard spring to the Emmitsburg 49 in the fourth period, and the visitors lost the ball on downs on the Mounts' 18 in the second stanza.

Both teams resorted to a ground attack, with the Mountmen completing one out of three passes and the visitors attempting but one.

Tide's 2d-Half Attack Beats Game Howard

Alabama Scores Three Touchdowns in Third Period to Win, 21-0

By the Associated Press

Tuscaloosa, Ala., Sept. 30.—Alabama's Crimson Tide opened its 1939 gridiron campaign today with a 21-0 victory over an unexpectedly tough Howard eleven before 6,000 fans. All the Bama touchdowns came in the second half.

After a stubborn Howard defense had turned back two first-half threats, Alabama power finally generated a touchdown late in the third period, Spencer, sub fullback, taking it over after Nelson and Mosley had brought it to the 1-yard marker on a drive that started on the Alabama 46. Sanford was inserted to add the extra point from placement to give Alabama a 7-0 lead.

The Tide scored again on a 39-yard march when Holt Rast, substitute end, took a fourth down pass for the final 5 yards. Sanford converted. Taking the ball on Howard's 28 on a fumbled kickoff, Alabama drove swiftly to another marker, Spencer diving the final yard. Sanford again converted.

Two desperate goal line stands by Howard stopped Alabama's first-quarter threat. One drive, starting on the Howard 9, stalled despite two 5-yard penalties against the Bulldogs who stopped five successive Alabama plays short of the scrimmage line. Another threat ended when Hanson, Bama fullback, fumbled on the 2-yard line just before the scoreless period ended.

West Virginia Triumphs, 44-0

By the Associated Press

Morgantown, W. Va., Sept. 30.—West Virginia University, battered about in a disappointing 1938 football season, gave token of a powerful comeback today beating West Virginia Wesleyan, 44-0.

An opening game crowd of nearly 7,000 saw the Mountaineers give Wesleyan the worst licking in their series since 1916, when the Mountaineers triumphed 54-7.

The victors started off by recovering a Bobcat fumble on the latter's 38 in the first period, and going across in five full plays, Johnny Carliss scoring.

In the second quarter a 54-yard run by Charley Hockenberry, taking the ball to the Bobcat 17, set up the second touchdown. Bob White went over.

North Carolina Wins Over Wake Forest

Tarheels Score 17 Points in Initial Quarter as 16,000 See Visitors Wait Until Final Period for First Score

By the Associated Press

Chapel Hill, N. C., Sept. 30.—Surpassing the fondest hopes of even its staunchest supporters, a powerful University of North Carolina football squad rolled over Wake Forest's Deacons 36 to 6 here today.

A crowd of 17,000 had come to see a close battle but the Tar Heels threatened to turn the game into a track meet with two touchdowns in the first six minutes of play. George Stirnweiss and Jim LaLanne led the North Carolina onslaught.

Last week the Tar Heels were favored to win over the Citadel but nobody expected a 50 to 0 win. Odds favored the Heels again today but no one had been rash enough to forecast a 36-6 point victory.

Now the surprising blue clad football warriors have two Southern Conference wins tucked away and have served notice on all future opponents of their versatility and power.

Leading North Carolina's defense were severin, Sid Sadoff, Faircloth, Gates Kimball and Dick White. Outstanding for the Deacons were Tom Tingle, John Jett and Butch Clark.

Duke Routs Davidson in Opener, 26-6

Favorites Held to 7-6 Lead in First Half of S. C. Game

By the Associated Press

Davidson, N. C., Sept. 30.—Duke's Blue Devils opened their Southern Conference football season by defeating a lighter but stubborn Davidson eleven, 26 to 6, here today before a crowd of 7,000. The Wildcats held their favored opponents to a 7-6 margin during the first half but Duke scored another touchdown in the third and turned on the power for two more in the final quarter.

Duke took to the air in the first period to score its first touchdown after a march from deep in its own territory. Wesley McAfee passed 18 yards to Bill Bailey in the end zone for the score and Ruffa converted from placement. Davidson's frequent sharp, short passes could not penetrate the Duke defense.

Duke's George McAfee intercepted a Davidson pass early in the second period and raced 27 yards for a touchdown, but the play was called back and Duke penalized for clipping. After a punt exchange Jap Davis, of Duke, fumbled on Davidson's 31. The Wildcats recovered and started a drive which paid off when Sharpe passed to Hackney for a touchdown. Yoder's attempted conversion was wide.

The second Duke touchdown came early in the third after a drive that started at Davidson's 37. Robinson took the ball over and Ruffa's placemen was good. Duke got the ball again on an intercepted pass and carried it to the 4, where the period ended with the Blue Devils leading, 14-6.

Duke scored in two plays after the fourth period opened. Robinson hit the line and then George McAfee went around left end for the touchdown. Bailey's conversion attempt failed. After the kickoff the Dukes began another touchdown march from their 45. Robinson plunged through right tackle for the score. Again the placement try failed. The Dukes starting from their 35, drove to the Davidson 4 as the game ended.

Kentuckians Blank Cadets In Rain, 21-0

Wildcats Start on Road to Victory in Second Period; Wet Ball Hampers Play

By the Associated Press

Lexington, Ky., Sept. 30.—The University of Kentucky opened its 1939 football season today before a rain-drenched crowd of 5,000 by handing Virginia Military Institute a 21-to-0 defeat on a soggy field.

Kentucky scored in each of the last three periods. Frequent fumbles marred play of both teams.

Neither team scored in the first period although V. M. I. threatened early with Pritchard's 32-yard runback of the opening kickoff to Kentucky's 5 and Kentucky, through a series of line plays, got to the Cadets' 2 near the end of the quarter. The ball was slippery and fumbles were frequent.

Kentucky punched over a touchdown in the second quarter, with Zoeller scoring on a 6-yard sprint around left end. Hardin booted the extra point. In the first half, Kentucky gained 26 yards by rushing to none for V. M. I. and had 3 first downs to none for the Cadets and led 7-0 at the half.

Kentucky scored again in the third when Tucker, sub for Combs, skirted left end from the 6-yard line behind beautiful blocking. Hardin again converted. Combs, Mullins and Tucker, hard-running Wildcat backs, threatened several times, and the score was kept down by exceptional kicking of Pritchard, V. M. I. quarterback.

Ermal Allen, alert sophomore back from Morristown, Tenn., scored for Kentucky in the fourth when he caught the ball as it skidded from Mitchell's arms and ran from V. M. I.'s 35-yard line for the score. Tucker converted. Later Allen intercepted a V. M. I. pass on his 35 and carried it to the V. M. I. 20. Final score, V. M. I., 0; Kentucky, 21.

41,000 Watch Stanford Tie Oregon, 7-7

Memorial Coliseum, Los Angeles, Sept. 30.—University of Southern California and the University of Oregon battled furiously on the ground and through the air here today to a 7-to-7 tie before a crowd of 41,000 football fans.

Aerial fireworks by Oregon's Jay Graybeal and Robert Smith, halfbacks, brought Oregon a touchdown 15 seconds before the gun ended the first half.

The U. S. C. Trojans scored six minutes before the game ended in a forward passing attack engineered by Doyle Nave, the "forgotten" quarterback who was jerked from the bench in the Rose Bowl last New Year's day to win a 7-to-3 U. S. C. victory over Duke.

Graybeal started the Oregon touchdown drive when he returned Grenville Lansdell's punt 16 yards to the Oregon 42. Fullback Frank Emmons then lateraled to Graybeal, who picked up 13 yards before he was downed. John Berry, Oregon's star right halfback, slashed off 10 yards through his right tackle. Graybeal then shot a pass to quarterback Dennis Donovan for first down on the Trojan 18.

Benedictine Beaten, 20-7

Woodberry Forest, Va., Sept. 30.—Scoring in the first, second and fourth quarters, Woodberry Forest downed a scrapping Benedictine team here today, 20-7.

Woodberry received the opening kickoff, and aided by Sam Fray's 40-yard run to the 9-yard line, put the ball over on fourth down with a line back by Bim Patton. Earle Bethea drop-kicked the extra point. Midway of the second quarter, Fray broke away again and traveled 54 yards to a touchdown. Capt. Jim Cole blocked out McDonal, Benedictine safety, to aid materially in the run. Bethea missed the extra point.

Benedictin's first score came early in the third period when Patton's punt was blocked on the home team's 10 and Isaacs recovered for the socre. A pass, Miller to Wilson, netted the extra point. Leading up to this tally the visitors had penetrated Woodberry territory on a series of passes from a spread formation.

The home team scored again in the fourth period on Capt. Cole's plunge over guard. A 30-yard punt return by Fray and a pass from Patton to Fray put the ball in position for the tally. Bethea kicked the extra point.

Richmond Overpowers R.-M., 26-0

By the Associated Press

Richmond, Va., Sept. 30.—The University of Richmond's versatile backfield began clicking in the third period after a fumbling start today to overpower a light Randolph-Macon football squad, 26 to 0.

Jack Powers, South Norfouk senior who played at end and guard before being shifted to fullback this year, climaxed a 31-yard drive with a touchdown through center late in the opening period. Bill Burge placekicked the extra point.

Fumbles on the 1-foot line and again on the 2-yard stripe cost Richmond two touchdown chances in the first half. Another on the Randolph-Macon 35 ended another long march downfield midway in the second period.

Arthur Jones, Richmond's All-State halfback, accounted for two of the third period tallies, counting once through center from the 5 and adding another on an 11-yard dash around his left end. Jones kicked one extra point but missed the other.

Middleton Wins On Blocked Kick

Special Dispatch to The Post

Martinsburg, W. Va., Sept. 30.—A blocked kick with 50 seconds to play paved the way for a 7-6 victory for Middleton (Conn.). High over Martinsburg High here this afternoon.

The game was a return for one played in Middletown last year which Martinsburg also lost.

Martinsburg scored in familiar fashion in the first quarter when Porterfield, tackle, blocked a punt on the four-yard line and Beard recovered. Flick then carried over. The try for extra point failed.

The game was delayed by rain in starting and two periods were played in a virtual cloudburst.

Plebes Defeat Massanutten Eleven, 34-6

Special Dispatch to The Post

Annapolis, Md., Sept. 30.—The powerful Navy plebe team ran over the lighter eleven of Massanutten Military Academy of Virginia here today, 34 to 6. The Middy yearlings scored in all but the final quarter when a troupe of substitutes were in the line-up.

The plebes struck fast and with telling effect, receiving the opening kickoff and successfully launching an 80-yard drive for the first score.

The Virginians caught a second string combination of plebes napping immediately after the opening of the second quarter, when Slaiter launched a pass to Beck that netted thirty yards and a touchdown.

Busik, Zechella and Ploszay were the sparks in the Navy offense, while Slaiter and Beck excelled for Massanutten.

YES INDEED! WE'RE KEEPING OUR "SCHOOLGIRL COMPLEXIONS"!

THE DIONNE QUINS USE ONLY PALMOLIVE!

Years ago, when the Quins had their first soap and water bath, Dr. Dafoe decided that only Palmolive, the soap made with Olive Oil, was gentle enough for their unusually tender skin!

Today, the soft, smooth, healthy skin of these lovely little girls proves how wise Dr. Dafoe really was. For the Quins have never used any soap except this fine, pure, gentle Palmolive!

Why don't you use this same Palmolive, the soap made only from Olive and Palm Oils? Use it for your complexion, your bath, and for the tender skin of your own little ones! Soon you'll agree that Dr. Dafoe was right when he said, "Only Palmolive for the Dionne Quins!"

Students assigned to handle the hand-set copy shown filling the sticks with type. One linotype machine serves the shop which is modern in every respect. Tech Life has kept up with changes in the newspaper world and is considered a typical stream-lined newspaper, with balanced illustrations.

POPULAR WITH ALL

Doris Brown scans last issue of the school paper. Four faculty advisors assist with production and make-up but reportorial assignments and editorials are handled by the student editors. On occasions a two-page pictorial section has been added, printed in color.

NEWS CONFERENCE

LENS HAWK FOR TECH LIFE

STAFF CARTOONIST AT WORK

Bob Raymond is the free-hand artist shown above and it is his job to contribute some lively drawings for future issues.

COMPOSING ROOM IN ACTION

Herman Meeks and William Doyle, having already shown considerable ability hand-setting type, have been moved over to the linotype machine where most of the type is set. In photo at right, Sports Editor Bob Walsh sounds out some of the football stars after invading the dressing room following afternoon practice. His predictions will follow after comparing notes with those jotted down during an interview with the coach.

HOW will it LOOK

SEVERAL YEARS FROM NOW . . . how will it look? That's the question to settle today! This book will help you.

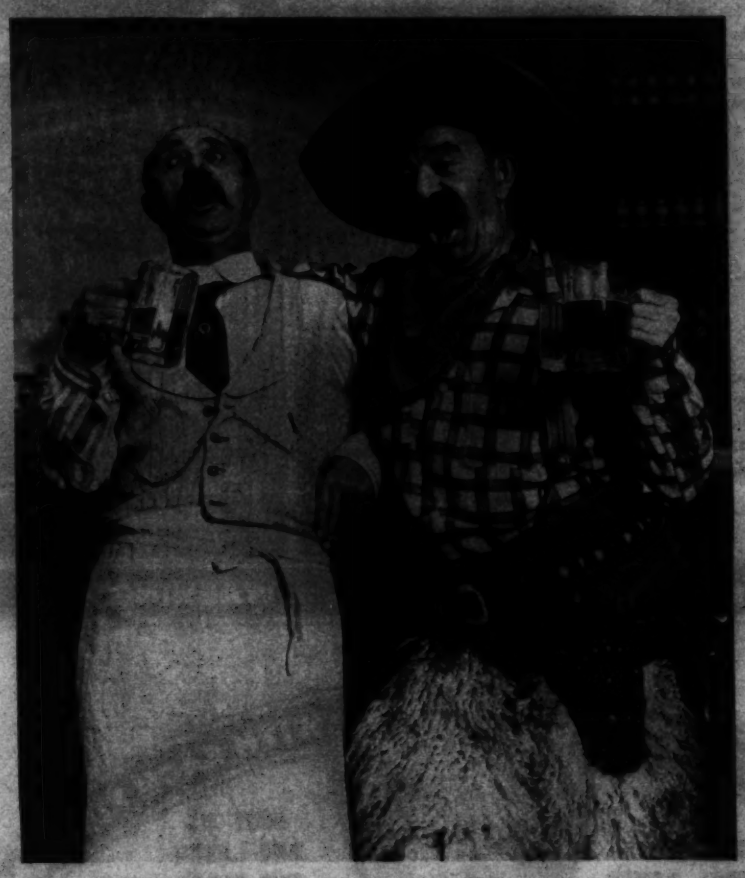
FIRST BATHING BEAUTIES TO APPEAR IN THE FLICKERS

wore costumes similar to those above. Mack Sennett, film pioneer who used the bathing girls in his comedies, will be among the veterans to appear in "Hollywood Cavalcade." Alice Faye is shown above with six present-day show girls wearing the beach attire of yesteryear.

Film Capital Turns Back The Pages

Stills from Hollywood's first historical motion picture about itself. Earlier scenes start with the Keystone Comedy days of 1913 and continue to the advent of sound in 1927.

KEYSTONE COPS WHOSE SLAPSTICK ANTICS delighted audiences 25 years ago. They'll play again in this new picture depicting the progress of film industry. Three of the veterans were able to report to the studio and get outfitted with over-sized helmets and baggy uniforms.

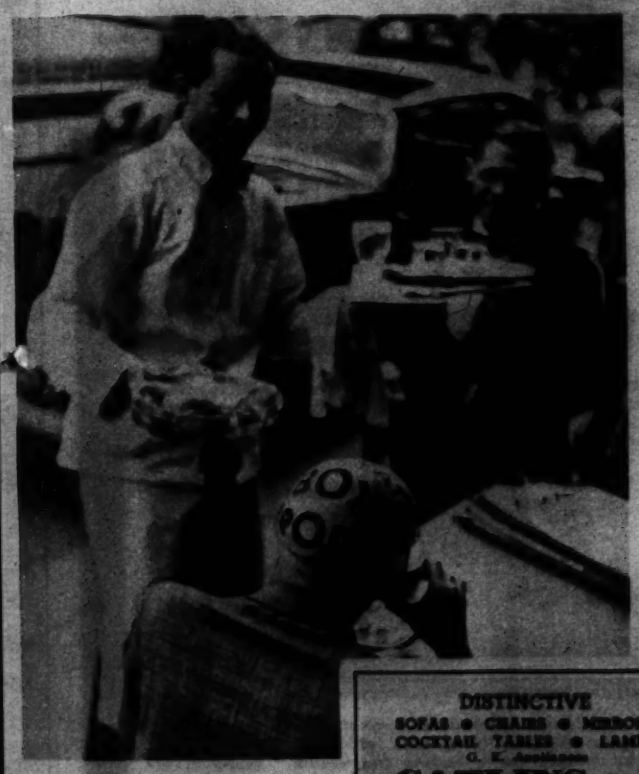


FAMED COMICS OF OTHER YEARS

Ben Turpin, cock-eyed comedian, and Chester Conklin, as a Western badman, reenact their comedy routines of the silent days. Turpin is now 70 years old. Conklin appeared with Gloria Swanson and Mack Swain back in 1917.

MOLLY OF THE MOVIES

Alice Faye plays the shy heroine of the silent days in the first historical film ever attempted about Hollywood. Gentleman in tails is George Givot.



SOL) HIS HEAD

An ordinarily serious-minded waiter is convulsed with mirth at the sight of this cranial advertising. Unable to obtain work at his trade, this jobless man "sold his head" to a sporting goods store.

Swagger yet slenderizing lines in a svelte coat after Schiaparelli. Note how the gleaming, black persian is set off with the addition of a rich black velvet collar and bow. One of the many chic persian lamb coats in our collection, presented in a wide price range. M. PASTERNAK, 1219 Connecticut Avenue.

To balance Your beauty

YOU MUST ACCENT YOUR EYES

Don't stop with glowing cheeks and rosy lips. Neglected eyes look pale and drab by contrast. It's easy to give your face perfect color balance. Darkened lashes and well-defined eyebrows do the trick. Just be sure you get the modern eye make-up in good taste — Maybelline Mascara and the Maybelline smooth-marking Eyebrow Pencil. Maybelline Mascara goes on beautifully, either in Solid-form or the new Cream-form (applied without water). Harmless, tear-proof, non-smarting. Approved by Good Housekeeping Bureau. The Maybelline Eyebrow Pencil is perfectly pointed to form graceful, tapering brows. See what a difference, when you bring out the beauty of your eyes! Use Maybelline Mascara and Eyebrow Pencil in a shade that flatters your type. Why not start today? Attractive purse sizes are obtainable at all 10c stores.

FALL HEADLINERS

SWEEPING BRIM TO WEAR WITH FALL TWEEDS

A rakish hat with brim swept over one eye, and spears of grosgrain ribbon at the back.

THIS ONE IN TIERS

Styled in military red felt, faced in black with circular cutout back, this snood is trimmed in black felt. The vogue for snoods went so well last year that it has been enlarged upon, with the result that current creations are brimming over, cascading down the back, and even swirling around the neck.

THE PILL BOX

Millinery, not military, are these pill boxes. This Talbot felt creation with crochet eye veil features a separate crocheted scarf that swirls over the head and under the chin.

ROSES AND BEAVER

If your coat is of beaver, or your suit beaver-trimmed, top it off with a tiny tilted beaver beret, mounted on a chenille snood, with bright red roses nestled high on your coiffure.

IN VELVET
